4,001 are libelous in their character. To charge a public official with having been a party to a fraudulent conspiracy, and to have been influenced in his official capacity by corrupt motives, is certainly a defamation likely to cause a breach of the peace, and great wrong to the sufferer. Such a charge, if published in a newspaper, would undoubtedly be actionable in damages, if it were shown to be false and malicious. But defendant contends that this charge was made in the course of judicial proceedings, in good faith, that it arose upon a proper occasion, and was pertinent to the issue, and is therefore protected as a privileged communication. Under the common law of England, no action lies against an attorney or litigant for defamatory words spoken or written in a pleading in judicial proceedings, even though they were unnecessary to support the case of the client, and were uttered or published without any justification or excuse, and from personal ill will towards the party defamed, arising from some previously existing cause, and are irrelevant to every question of fact in issue before the court. It seems, then, that under the English law the mere fact that the defamatory language was used in a judicial proceeding is an absolute protection regardless of all the considerations. Plaintiff's counsel contend that in Louisiana privileged communications in judicial proceedings are unknown to our law, and that article 2315 of the Revised Civil Code furnishes the true and only rule for determining the right of action in all cases—libel and slander included—where damages are claimed for torts, even though the defamatory matter be published in a judicial proceeding. Many authorities are cited to support this position, notably that of Miller v. Holstein, 18 La. 389. I have examined these proceedings, and they undoubtedly show that the English law of absolute protection does not prevail here, and that the foundation and measure of liability for a libel uttered in a judicial proceeding are found in article 2315 of the Code; but I do not understand them as holding that no sort of privileged communications is known to our law." The learned judge then proceeded to cite and quote a number of decisions in which the defendants in suits brought against them for damages had been protected from liability, by reason of the acts complained having occurred in the course of judicial proceedings; and from those decisions he reached the conclusion that in some cases an absolute exemption from liability existed, and that the present case was one of that character. There is a great difference between an absolute exemption from liability for damages under a given state of facts proven, and an absolute exemption from liability to a suit for the purpose of testing whether such a state of facts exists as would convey with it such protection from damages. There is a great difference between the situation of parties at the end of a lawsuit, and after evidence adduced, and that of parties at the beginning of a lawsuit, standing on pleadings. There can be no doubt that the fact that an act complained of occurred in judicial proceedings may have a great bearing and influence upon both the burden and sufficiency of proof on the final result, on a question of liability to damages for that act. Such a fact being shown, with its attendant circumstances, may sometimes afford partial protection, sometimes afford absolute protection; but it may also frequently intensify and aggravate a wrong. The determination of such questions depends almost necessarily upon facts resting still in pais, which can only be positively and finally ascertained through the instrumentality of a suit. While it may be true that, given a particular state of facts, legal protection from liability would follow as a matter of law, it is none the less true that the facts themselves on which exemption is based are opened to inquiry and to judicial scrutiny. Any other doctrine would convert the courts of the country into instrumentalities for wrong and into engines of oppression. Nothing in the Gardner Case, 43 La. Ann. 454, which was one tried on its merits and turned upon the burden and sufficiency of proof, is out of line with the views herein expressed. In that case, this court, speaking of privileged communications, said: "In privileged communications the party is protected from the damages, unless the occasion was used as a means of inflicting a willful and malicious injury upon the plaintiff," and, referring to protection arising from judicial proceedings, it declared: "If extended to those who were in the honest pursuit of private right." It was never once intimated that the courts of our state were places from which, as from places of secure refuge, parties could with impunity perpetrate wrong. Weil v. Israel, 42 La. Ann. 955.

We have examined plaintiff's pleadings very carefully. They are both full and precise. If, in their consideration, we strike out and eliminate the question of "privilege," it must be conceded plaintiff's petition disclosed a course of action. If we replace that question, we find that plaintiff has specifically affirmed the nonexistence of the conditions upon which the right of exemption is dependent. He has a right to go to trial on that issue, as one of fact, to be ascertained by evidence.

For the reasons herein assigned, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be annulled, avoided and reversed, the case reinstated, and that it be remanded for further proceeding according to law.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

STATE of Connecticut, ex rel. John

v.

(.....Conn.....)

1. An appeal from a decision in quo warranto will not be dismissed because the appellant pending the appeal has been removed from office for insubordination in taking the appeal.
2. A message of disapproval of the acts of the board of aldermen by the mayor has no effect when the charter provides for his approval and disapproval only of measures passed by both boards which constitute the common council.
3. A person appointed to fill a vacancy in a board of police commissioners is appointed only till the end of the term of his predecessor under a charter providing generally for appointment to fill a vacancy but which provides for two year terms and for the expiration of a part of them on each year with other provisions as to a non-partisan board.
4. Members of a board of police commissioners need not remain actually in their seats during the time in which a warrant of arrest is being served on absent members to procure a quorum.
5. A misrecital of the hour of meeting in a warrant for arrest of absent members of a board of commissioners which could mislead no one will not impair the validity of the warrant.

6. The casting vote of mayor may be given on the choice of officers as well as on a measure of legislation.
7. An alderman is not deprived of the right to vote against the confirmation of a person to succeed him in the office of police commissioner by his interest in the result.
8. The vote of aldermen when once given and counted by the mayor and his declaration of the result can be rejected for interest only by action of the board and does not make an appointment to office by such vote subject to collateral attack.
9. The specification of certain objects in a notice of a meeting of a board of aldermen does not exclude action upon any others which are within the range of its general powers.
10. A person is not a de facto police commissioner when he has not the reputation of being such or his acts and authority are not generally recognized or acquiesced in or such as to lead men to suppose that he was such officer, especially where there is a rightful commissioner who is claiming the office.
11. Want of notice to rightful commissioners of the meeting of a pretended board is fatal to action by the latter without a quorum of legal members.
12. An office created by ordinance may be abolished by ordinance.
13. A chief of police under that title is not required for a city so as to prevent abolition of that office and the devolution of its functions on a captain of police by a statute referring to such an officer or by the city charter making a similar reference where these manifestly refer

NOTE.—Among the interesting questions in the above case to which we call attention is that as to the right of an alderman to vote against the confirmation of a person to succeed him in another office. As to this question, see note to Fort Wayne v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (Ind.) 13 L. R. A. 367.

to the functions of the office and not to the name of the officer.

(June 5, 1893.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Fairfield County in favor of relator in a proceeding in the nature of quo warranto to establish the right of relator to the office of chief of police of the city of Bridgeport. Reversed.

Defendant claimed that relator had been removed from the office of chief of police by the board of police commissioners for cause, and the duties of his office had been committed to defendant. Also that the office of chief of police had been abolished by ordinance. A demurrer was filed to the latter defense, which was sustained. To the other allegation a replication was filed claiming that the attempted removal by the board of police commissioners was irregular and void. A trial resulted in judgment of ouster. After the appeal was perfected, relator filed a plea in abatement of the appeal and also a motion to dismiss on the ground that since it was taken, defendant had been removed from office and his successor appointed and that consequently the relator was in full exercise of the duties of the office of chief of police. Appellant replied that he had been removed for prosecuting the appeal.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. J. B. Klein, for appellant:

The argument that the duties constitute the office and therefore if the duties continue the office continues, is unsound when the office has been abolished and the duties transferred to a known existing office.

Offices peculiarly local, as boards of public works, water commissioners, etc., must necessarily be controlled and regulated by the municipality. To give the legislature power over these local offices would be subversive of all local self-government.

State v. Denny, 4 L. R. A. 79, 118 Ind. 400; People v. Hurlbut, 24 Mich. 44, 9 Am. Rep. 103; People v. Albarton, 55 N. Y. 50.

If the charter vests in the council the power to establish a force and create and designate the offices of that force, it cannot be contended in the absence of charter restriction that the power to create offices may not abolish them.

The ordinance is valid and the office of chief of police abolished.

The validity of the ordinance must be conceded and the office of chief of police abolished if the common council have the power to pass such an ordinance.

Volk v. Newark, 47 N. J. L. 119; Butcher v. Camden, 29 N. J. Eq. 478; People v. Mahaney, 18 Mich. 482; Williams v. Newport, 12 Bush, 488; Augusta v. Sweeney, 44 Ga. 468, 9 Am. Rep. 172; Mechem, Pub. Off. 466.

On June 13 last Mr. Rylands was dismissed from the police force on charges of willful disobedience of the orders of the police board after notice given him of the charges, an opportunity to be heard, a hearing had, evidence taken, a special meeting had to review the testimony before rendering decision, each member of the board duly notified of the particular object of each meeting held, and the resolution of dismissal adopted by the concurrence of three members.

Here was ample cause of which under section 58 of the charter the board of police commissioners are the sole judges and every element of a legal removal.

Dill. Mun. Corp. § 250.

We maintain the legality of the board which dismissed Mr. Rylands. There is no contention about the legality of two of the members of the board, viz., Messrs. Grant and Rishor. The contention is over the legality of Messrs. Walsh and Bogart. They were appointed for a term of two years, and their term began with their appointment and continued two years.

It is claimed that the appointing power nominated Mr. Walsh for the unexpired term of Mr. Beardsley, therefore, Mr. Walsh by the terms of his appointment held for an unexpired term. The appointee holds for the term provided by the charter, not for the period designated by the mayor.

People v. Burbank, 12 Cal. 379; State v. Brady, 42 Ohio St. 507; People v. Hall, 104 N. Y. 176; Stadler v. Detroit, 13 Mich. 346; People v. Lord, 9 Mich. 227; State v. Batt, 38 La. Ann. 955.

The act of the mayor in appointing for the unexpired term is a nullity, if the charter makes the term of office two years.

In all cases in which it was deemed desirable by the legislature to provide for the filling of vacancies by a limitation to the unexpired term of the late incumbent, it seems to have been carefully provided for; and from the fact that the legislature did so express their intention in these cases and failed to do so in others, it is apparent that their omission to do so in the latter was not accidental, but designated the maxim, "expressio unius est exclusio alterius" should be most critically applied.

Atty-Gen. v. Brunst, 3 Wis. 794; Sansbury v. Middleton, 11 Md. 299.

Appointments to fill a vacancy are appointments to fill vacancies in the office of police commissioner, not in the term of office.

Atty-Gen. v. Brunst and Sansbury v. Middleton, supra; State v. Ware, 13 Or. 380.

At common law, vacancy ex vi termini means vacancy in the office, and not in the term. And this is ordinarily the meaning attached to the word when a vacancy is spoken of.

The term of an office is said to be a fixed period prescribed for holding the office; and is the estate or interest which the incumbent has in it.

2 Bl. Com. 144; People v. McClave, 90 N. Y. 87; Hughes v. Buckingham, 5 Smedes & M. 649; 2 Ops. Atty-Gen. p. 833.

Upon the office being filled, the incumbent will have a right to the office for a full term from the date of his appointment.

v. Hutson, 1 McCord, L. 840; McAfee v. Russell, 29 Miss. 85; Paine, Elections, § 207.

The nominations of Sperry and Reynolds are upon the table of the board of aldermen, and Walsh and Bogart hold over under the charter, section 5.

Cushing, Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, §§ 1444, 1449, 1452.

The rules of order adopted by a city council are binding on that body.

State v. Hoyt, 2 Or. 246.

It goes without saying that this was no legal confirmation. An arbitrary ruling of the mayor cannot have the effect to nullify the act of a majority of the council.

Chariton v. Holliday, 60 Iowa, 894.

The mayor cannot confirm his own nomination.

All parts of the charter are to be construed together as one harmonious whole. If there be a conflict between the provisions, the last one shall prevail.

People v. McClave, supra.

You cannot make nominations by and with the consent of the board of aldermen, if the mayor can vote on his own nominations.

If the charter provides a method of giving notices of meetings, that must be strictly obeyed.

1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. 268; Lord v. Anoka, 36 Minn. 176.

The meeting two days after the call was illegal.

South School District v. Blakeslee, 13 Conn. 284; Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 481; State v. Bonnell, 35 Ohio St. 10.

Every resolution or ordinance (chap. 8, § 7, p. 109, of Ordinances) must be approved by the mayor.

That approval can only be proved "by a written declaration attested by his signature" upon the nominations made, and a vote not thus approved became inoperative.

The action was final and must be approved by the mayor. Signing the minutes of the meeting of May 23 is not equivalent to signing a resolution.

Mr. Henry Stoddard also for appellant. Messrs. Daniel Davenport and Stiles Judson, Jr., for appellee:

Since judgment was rendered and execution issued by the superior court in favor of the relator, the respondent has been dismissed from the police force by the lawful police commissioners, and his successor duly appointed, and the respondent has ceased to be captain of police or to perform, or claim to perform, any of the said powers and duties pertaining to said office.

Under such circumstances "even if the court below had committed error, a new trial should not be granted."

The office of chief of police under existing laws is not only so imbedded in the charter as to place it beyond the destructive tendencies exhibited by the city council of 1891, but the incumbent of such offices is a state officer, and recognized as such by the general statutes of the state.

Farrell v. Bridgeport, 45 Conn. 195; Burch v. Hardwicke, 30 Gratt. 24. 32 Am. Rep. 640; Andrews v. King, 77 Me. 230.

Samis v. King, 40 Conn. 309, and Farrell v. Bridgeport, supra, have expressly decided that the action of the council in attempting to legislate out of office the chief of police and the whole police force of the city, by repealing the ordinance which provided for them was void in all respects, as being in conflict with both the language and spirit of the charter.

If the common council has the power to pass a valid ordinance of the description of the one in question, then the power of appointment or removal of any officer of the force is entirely in the hands of the common council.

Its purpose and effect was to remove Mr. Rylands from and to appoint Mr. Pinkerman to exercise the powers and discharge the duties for which the board had selected Mr. Rylands and had not selected Mr. Pinkerman.

Thus the common council would be enabled to do that by indirection which it was expressly restrained from doing by the carefully devised provisions of the charter.

Such a construction of the charter must be wrong and the court will not adopt it.

Where the tenure of office is established in the constitution, the legislature may not abridge the term, and when established in the charter of a municipal corporation it cannot be abridged by the common council.

And where a method of removal is prescribed in the organic law, only that method can be followed.

Love v. Com. 3 Met. (Ky.) 237; Brown v. Grover, 6 Bush, 1.

The recognition in the charter of such officer as the "chief of police," and the imposing of specific duties upon such officer, creates the office itself in the most full and ample manner.

The powers, authority, and jurisdiction constitute the office and are of the essence of it and inseparable from it.

The same reasoning that is adopted by the courts in respect to a constitutional office that is sought to be abolished or abridged by legislative enactment, applies with equal force to a charter office that is sought to be disturbed by a city ordinance.

Dec. 740; Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 235.

The attempted repeal really means nothing. The first two sections attempt to repeal, and the third section restores. There is no time when the office of chief of police ceased to exist. It is the same as if no law had been passed.

This ordinance which preserves intact every power and duty of that office, and merely describes the incumbent of it as "captain of police," if it accomplishes the feat of legislating Rylands out and Pinkerman in, is an act of the appointing power which is exclusively vested in the board of police commissioners, and therefore in conflict with the charter.

While we contend that the action of the board was perfectly regular whereby the nominations of Reynolds and Sperry were subsequently confirmed, yet, even if a municipal council—which itself is a miniature legislature—departs from parliamentary usage in respect to its proceedings, its action will be legal if such departure does not violate the provisions of the charter nor the general law.

The mayor is clothed with the power, under the city charter, to give the casting vote, and no restrictions or limitations are placed upon the exercise of that right. The right may be exercised by him when the result shows a tie vote—whenever that condition arises—without regard to the character of the business that is being acted on.

Spalding v. Watson, 35 Kan. 89.

Among those voting in the negative, on the subject of confirming the nominations, was David Walsh, as a member of said board. We deny that he was lawfully entitled to cast his vote on the confirmation of his successor, inasmuch as it related to a matter in which he had a substantial interest.

The nominations were therefore confirmed by a majority of those entitled to vote, without the aid of the mayor's vote.

Stockwell v. White Lake Twp. Board, 22 Mich. 341.

When Reynolds and Sperry qualified by filing their oath of office, the right to exercise the office on the part of Walsh and Bogart, ipso facto, ceased, and Reynolds and Sperry became de jure members of said board.

Their claims to said offices and their exercise of the rights and privileges were open and notorious and known and recognized by the chief executive of the city and by the public generally.

They were, therefore, de facto commissioners as well as de jure, and it is a self-evident proposition that there cannot be a de jure officer and another de facto officer exercising the same office at the same time.

If the charter made the necessary length of the term two years, it was not competent for the mayor, by the language of his nomination, or for the board of aldermen by its confirmation of the nomination, to extend or abridge that term, or to confer office for any other than the term prescribed by law.

From the present charter it is made apparent that the intention of the lawmakers of the state had been to create and continue in the city of Bridgeport a police board to consist of four members, so chosen that two of them shall go out of office at the beginning of each municipal year, and their successors then be chosen. The alternating feature of the membership is made clearly apparent.

Courts preserve the contemplated composition of such board by holding that the provision for filling a vacancy referred to a vacancy for an unexpired term.

Baldwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plea in abatement which has been interposed by the state goes upon the ground that the further prosecution of this appeal would simply invite the court to decide questions that are no longer of any practical importance, since the relator is now in full and undisturbed possession of the office which was the occasion of the action. It appears, however, that he has recovered such possession by reason of the removal of the defendant from his office of captain of police, and that this removal was made pending the appeal, and upon charges of insubordination preferred by the relator. The insubordination consisted of acts similar to those upon which the original quo warranto proceedings were based, and the decree of removal is also placed in part upon the ground that the prosecution of this appeal, and of an action of mandamus brought or promoted by the defendant to reinstate him in office, interferes with the harmonious working of the police force.

An appellee can maintain a plea in abatement of this kind only on the ground that the inquiry whether the judgment appealed from was right or wrong has become immaterial. But if the judgment of ouster was wrong, to dismiss the appeal, at the instance of the appellee, because the appellant has been removed from office for prosecuting the appeal, and the appellee reinstated, would be to allow the relator to take advantage, if not of his own wrong, at least of the error of the court, to defeat the remedy provided by law for the redress of such an error. The appellant did not voluntarily withdraw from the contest over the office claimed by the relator. He was forced out of it by a sentence of removal, procured by the relator, and based upon an assumption of the validity of the judgment appealed from, and the consequent misconduct of the appellant in endeavoring to obtain its reversal. The appellant's reply to the plea in abatement summarizes the appellee's contention, not unfairly, by the statement that "the defendant, Pinkerman, was dismissed on Rylands' charges because he appealed his case against Rylands to this court, and now Rylands asks that this appeal to this court be dismissed because Pinkerman has been dismissed from office because he took the appeal." It is true that the state is, in form, the appellee, and that the pleadings do not show that the state took any part in the proceedings which have resulted in the dismissal of the appellant from office. But in informations of this nature the relator is the substantial complainant, and conducts the cause. The only brief filed in this case for the appellee is entitled "brief for relator," and states that execution was issued "in favor of the relator," on the judgment of ouster rendered by the superior court. The state has no interest, except that the rightful incumbent of the office in controversy, if such an office exists, should exercise its functions, and we do not think the acts of either of the claimants should be allowed to prejudice the right of the other to a final determination of the question of title. The matter in difference is not a mere bill of costs in a contest over a position in a private corporation, as in State v. Tudor, 5 Day, 329, 5 Am. Dec. 162. The powers of one of our largest municipal corporations as to a subject vitally affecting its peace and order are the subject of controversy, and in our opinion the appellant has a right to require us to review a judgment by an execution issued under which he was ousted from the exercise of the functions of chief of police before he was dismissed from the office of captain of police. These positions are of a class in which the state, and the whole people of the state, have a deep and immediate concern. Whoever holds one of them holds it as a trust from the state, resting, not on contract with the city, but on an appointment made by the city under a power conferred on it by the state. Farrell v. Bridgeport, 45 Conn. 191, 195. We think the reply to the plea in abatement and motion to dismiss is sufficient, and that they must be overruled.

The appeal presents two main questions,—that as to the validity of the removal of the relator from the office of chief of police in June, 1891, and that as to the effect of the ordinance of September, 1891, relating to the abolition of that office, which went into effect a month before the information was filed. The present charter of the city of Bridgeport was passed in 1887. 10 Priv. Laws, p. 510. It contains the following provisions as to the constitution and administration of the police department: "Sec. 50. There shall continue to be a board of police commissioners, of fire commissioners, and park commissioners, each of which shall consist of four electors of said city, and each commissioner shall hold his office for the term of two years, and until his successor is appointed and qualified, and on the expiration of the terms of office of each of the present commissioners their successors shall be appointed for the term of two years next succeeding, and until their successors shall be appointed and qualified. The mayor of said city shall, by and with the advice and consent of the board of aldermen of said city, appoint the members of the several boards of police commissioners, of fire commissioners and park commissioners, and the appointment of the members of the said several boards of commissioners as aforesaid shall be made in such manner as to divide the membership of each of said boards equally between the two leading political parties for the time being, and whenever any vacancy shall occur in any of said several boards of commissioners it shall be filled in the manner provided aforesaid for the appointment of members. The mayor of said city, by and with the advice and consent of two thirds of the members of the board of aldermen, may remove any member of either of said boards of commissioners for cause. The members of either of said boards of commissioners now in office shall retain their positions during the term for which they were elected, subject to removal in the manner hereinbefore set forth. The mayor of the city shall, ex officio, be a member of said several boards of commissioners, but shall have no vote in any of their proceedings except in case of a tie vote. He shall preside at all meetings of said boards at which he is present, and at all meetings of said boards three members, exclusive of the mayor, shall constitute a quorum, and the concurrence of three of them shall be necessary for the transaction of business. The commissioners of said several boards, before entering upon the discharge of their duties, shall be sworn to a faithful performance thereof. Each of said boards shall appoint a clerk, whose duty it shall be to keep, in books provided for that purpose, true records of the doings of said boards respectively." "Sec. 58. The police commissioners of said city of Bridgeport shall have the sole power of appointment and removal of officers and members of the police department of said city; and it shall be the duty of the said board of police commissioners to appoint suitable persons to fill the offices of said police department, and other suitable persons as members of said police department, and to suspend, remove or expel any officer or member from office or membership in said department whenever, in the judgment of said commissioners, such suspension, removal, or expulsion shall be for the best interests of the city; and whenever any person shall be appointed an officer or member of said police department, or whenever any officer or member of said police department shall be suspended, removed, or expelled from his office or membership in said department, it shall be the duty of the said board of police commissioners to give a written notice, within a reasonable time, to the city clerk of said city, of such appointment, suspension, removal, or expulsion. The present police force of said city shall hold their respective offices, unless previously suspended, removed, or expelled, until others are appointed in their stead; and every officer or member of said police department shall hold his office and membership in said department until removed or expelled by said board of police commissioners for cause, of which said board of police commissioners shall be the sole judges. Nothing contained in this section shall be so construed as to prevent the common council of said city of Bridgeport from increasing or reducing the members of the police force of said city or creating new offices in said police department; and in case the common council of said city shall vote to reduce the police force of said city, the board of police commissioners shall remove a sufficient number of the officers and members of said police force to conform to the vote of said common council. Sec. 59. The common council of said city shall have power to pass an ordinance or ordinances relative to the proper regulation of the police department, and relative to whatever further control of said department the said common council may deem proper to place in the hands of said board of police commissioners." By section 24 the common council was also authorized "to make, alter and repeal orders and ordinances, not inconsistent with the provisions of the charter, which shall be valid and operative within the limits of said city," relative to a number of specified matters, and among others "to the city police, . . . to the filling of vacancies which may occur in the common council, or in any office appertaining to said city for the unexpired term, not otherwise provided for in this act;" and to the duties of all officers of the city "not expressly defined by the provisions of this act." General power was also given to make and repeal ordinances "relative to all other subjects that shall be deemed necessary and proper for the protection and preservation of the health, property, and lives of the citizens," and "to constitute and appoint all necessary and proper committees and officers, under such names and appellations as they may deem appropriate," and to "invest them with the power and authority necessary and proper to carry into full effect all the orders and ordinances of said common council." Section 62 provides that bail bonds and recognizances in the city court may be taken "by the chief of police or acting chief of police of said city," and that each member of the police department shall have "power, by the permission of the chief of said department, to pursue and arrest with process, in any part of this state, persons charged with any criminal act committed in said city." Section 63 provides that "the chief of said police department shall have power, subject to the control of the board of police commissioners of said city, to suppress all tumults," enter houses of ill fame, and raise the posse of the city to aid him in the exercise of his authority.

The common council adopted, before the present controversy arose, an ordinance relative to the police department. Section 1 of this ordinance declares that "the board of police commissioners shall have the general management and control of the police department," and may make rules for its government, consistent with the laws of the state and ordinances of the city. Section 6 provides that "the regular police force of this city shall consist of a chief of police, captain, lieutenant, first and second sergeant, and not less than ten nor more than twenty-eight patrolmen." Section 9 provides that "the chief of police, subject to the control of the mayor and police commissioners, shall have the control and management of the subordinate officers and members of the police department, and they shall obey his orders. He shall also have charge of the station houses and the custody of all persons committed to or confined therein. He shall also keep a record of the officers and members of the police force and of their doings. He shall also keep an accurate monthly pay-roll of the police force, in which he shall designate the date and period of service of each member of the force, and the several amounts due them respectively for that month, and when payment is made, shall take the receipt, on such pay roll, of each member for the amount paid him; and such pay roll thus kept and receipted shall thereupon be lodged by him with the city auditor to be kept on file. In the absence of the chief of police, or when from any cause he shall be unable to act, the captain shall take his place and perform his duties, and in the absence or inability to act of both the chief and captain, the lieutenant shall discharge the duties of chief of police." The relator was duly appointed and qualified as chief of police in January, 1890. In December, 1890, the four police commissioners severally resigned their positions, and shortly afterwards the vacancies were duly filled by the appointment of Messrs. Beardsley, Bogart, Grant, and Rishor. In February, 1891, the mayor appointed David Walsh to fill a vacancy occasioned by the death of Mr. Beardsley, to hold office for the unexpired term. The form in which this appointment was made raises an important question in the case, the defendant contending that, though purporting to be for the unexpired term, it was, in law, by force of the charter provisions above quoted, an appointment for a full term of two years. Underlying this question there is also obviously another, namely, what was the length of the term for which Mr. Beardsley was originally appointed? If it was for the unexpired portion of the term of his predecessor, Mr. Grant, it terminated in April, 1891; but, if it was for a full term of two years, it would not come to an end until December, 1892, and Mr. Walsh, even if his appointment were restricted to the limit placed upon it by the form of his nomination, would remain in office until that date, as would also the two others appointed in December, 1890.—Messrs. Bogart and Grant,—while Mr. Rishor, whose nomination was not sent in until January, 1891, would hold office until January, 1893.

The terms for which Messrs. Grant and Spencer, who had been replaced by Messrs. Beardsley and Bogart, were originally appointed expired in April, 1891, and the mayor then nominated M. L. Reynolds to succeed Mr. Walsh, and E. H. Sperry to succeed Mr. Bogart. When the nominations were presented, upon motion of Mr. Walsh, who was a member of the board of aldermen, the board voted to lay them upon the table until the last meeting in March, 1892. At the next meeting of the board the mayor sent in a message disapproving this action, and a motion "to sustain the veto" resulted in a tie vote. The mayor then voted for the motion, and declared it carried. By the city charter (section 7) he is empowered to "preside at the meetings of the board of aldermen, and shall have a casting vote only in case of a tie." It is sufficient to remark, with reference to the proceeding last mentioned, that as the charter only provides for the approval or disapproval by the mayor of measures which have passed both of the boards constituting, with him, the common council, his message of disapproval was without any legal effect.

The mayor, who had power to convene the common council at any time, subsequently called a meeting of the board of councilmen for May 18th, and a meeting of the board of aldermen at half past 7 o'clock on May 20, each call specifying the object of the meeting as follows: "For the purpose of electing a liquor and dog agent, also a public pound keeper, and transacting any other business proper to be done at said meeting." The city ordinances provided that the common council, at special meetings, might act upon any matter mentioned in the call, "and do any other business proper to be done at any regular meeting." By the charter (section 7) the board of aldermen and the board of councilmen are "two separate bodies," holding (section 26) separate meetings. On May 20, at half past 7, the mayor and all the aldermen were at the city hall, six of the latter, including Mr. Walsh, being in the chamber where the meeting was to be held and the rest of the board, also numbering six, being in an adjoining room in conference with the mayor. Seven aldermen were necessary, under the charter, to constitute a quorum, and the six who were in the aldermanic chamber, and who had come there for the purpose of participating in the meeting, after waiting until 10 minutes past 8 without being joined by the others, agreed to leave the hall and the city, in order to prevent any action at the meeting with reference to the appointment of police commissioners. They then drove together to an adjoining town, and were thereafter in hiding, in various parts of the state, until noon on May 22. Five minutes after they had left the city hall, the mayor and the six aldermen who had been with him entered the aldermanic chamber, and the meeting was called to order. The charter (section 7) gave those present at any meeting of the board, if less than a quorum, power to require the mayor to issue a warrant to arrest and bring in the absent members. Such a warrant was thereupon issued, and from that time until noon of May 22 the mayor and the six remaining aldermen, or a majority of them, were continuously in or about the aldermanic chamber for the purpose of keeping the meeting alive. At noon on May 22 the six absentees voluntarily returned to the city, and, the warrant being read to them, entered the chamber with the officer, and took their seats. The mayor and the six other aldermen were present, and the meeting was called to order. After some miscellaneous business, in which all participated, the mayor presented in writing the nominations of Messrs. Reynolds and Sperry as police commissioners. Objection was made to their presentation, which resulted in a tie, whereupon the mayor gave a casting vote, and declared them in order. Votes confirming the appointments were then had and declared in the same manner, by the casting vote of the mayor. A dog and liquor agent was then elected, and a good deal of other business transacted, in which all present took part. Messrs. Reynolds and Sperry were soon afterwards sworn in and qualified as police commissioners, and Mr. Sperry's predecessor surrendered to him his badge of office, and made no further claim to the position. Mr. Walsh, however, as whose successor Mr. Reynolds had been nominated, refused to recognize him as such, and continued to claim to be a police commissioner, performing some of the acts properly appertaining to that position, while Mr. Reynolds performed others. Mr. Walsh was still recognized as a commissioner by Messrs. Grant and Rishor and by the clerk of the board. Mr. Reynolds was recognized as a commissioner by the mayor and the relator, as chief of police. Each also had recognition and support from friends and partisans in and out of the common council. The mayor called a meeting of the board of police commissioners for organization on May 30, 1891, at the city hall, on notice to Messrs. Grant, Rishor, Reynolds, and Sperry, but it was attended only by himself and Messrs. Reynolds and Sperry. No business could be transacted, under section 50 of the charter, without the concurrence of three commissioners. Meetings of the rival board were held at the house of one of its members, on notice to the mayor and Messrs. Grant, Rishor, Walsh, and Bogart, at which Messrs. Grant, Rishor, and Walsh attended, with the clerk, and business was transacted. At one of these meetings held on June 11, 1891, a vote was passed purporting to remove the relator, for cause, from the office of chief of police. He had been summoned to appear and answer the charges against him, and had paid no attention to the summons.

It is evident that he was not removed from office, unless Mr. Walsh can be counted as one of the three commissioners whose concurrence was necessary. If his appointment, in February, 1891, to fill the unexpired term of Mr. Beardsley, amounted in law to an appointment for a full term of two years, or if Mr. Beardsley's term was one of that length, he was rightfully a member of the board in June. But we are of opinion that complete effect can be given to the provisions of the charter only by construing it as confining appointments to fill vacancies to appointments for the residue of the unexpired term. The evident intent of section 50 is to secure to the city at all times, so far as possible, the services of commissioners, half of whom have had the benefit of at least a year's experience in office, and to divide the membership of each half equally between the leading political parties. Farmater v. State, 102 Ind. 90, 93. Such a board had existed in Bridgeport since 1868. The charter of that year provided for the election of two commissioners to serve for one year, and two for two years, and for the annual election thereafter of two to serve for two years, and secured a nonpartisan character to the board by allowing no one to vote for more than two out of the four, and requiring the election of deputy commissioners to replace each elected commissioner in case of a vacancy. From that time until the resignation of the entire board, in December, 1890, its membership had been annually renewed by the appointment of two commissioners for a term of two years, each belonging to a different political party from the other. Were the contention of the defendant well founded, the successors of the four commissioners who resigned in December, 1890, should have been, and in law were, appointed each for a two-years term, thus totally and forever frustrating the carefully devised scheme of alternating succession which had been followed for twenty years. It was therefore incumbent upon the mayor in April, 1891, to send in nominations for two commissioners to succeed Messrs. Walsh and Bogart. He did so, and we must next inquire whether they were properly confirmed by the board of aldermen.

In our opinion the meeting of that board on May 20 was legally convened, was called to order within a reasonable time from the hour appointed, and was legally continued until May 22. South School Dist. v. Blakeslee, 18 Conn. 227. The provisions of the charter for bringing in absent members contemplated such a contingency as in fact occurred on that occasion, and it was unnecessary for the members in attendance to remain actually in their seats in the aldermanic chamber during the hours or days which elapsed before the absentees returned. The warrant of arrest issued by the mayor described the hour at which the meeting was originally called as 8 o'clock, which was, in fact, half past 7, but the error could mislead no one, and did not impair the validity of the instrument. It is immaterial whether the nominations for police commissioners were taken from the table at this meeting in a manner pursuant to the rules of the board, or whether they were entertained as new business. The board had power to suspend or disregard its rules of order by the vote of a majority; and to vote on the consideration of the nominations, in effect, suspended all rules inconsistent with such a vote. Cushing, Parl. Law, §§ 794, 1478; Bennett v. New Bedford, 110 Mass. 438, 439; State v. Chapman, 44 Conn. 595; Hough v. Bridgeport, 57 Conn. 290, 295.

Section 24 of the charter declares that "the mayor, board of aldermen, and board of councilmen of said city shall constitute and be a body known and denominated the common council of the city of Bridgeport." Section 7, as previously quoted, provides that the mayor shall preside at the meetings of the board of aldermen, "and shall have a casting vote only in case of a tie." There is no limitation of this casting vote to any particular kind or class of business. A tie is more likely to occur upon questions involving political considerations, and arises most often as to the creation of offices or appointments to office. This the legislature may be presumed to have had in mind when this section was adopted, and we see no reason for adopting a narrow construction of a provision plainly adapted to the prevention of "deadlocks," which are never more injurious to good government than when the result of a contest which keeps an office vacant that the public interests require to be filled, or prolongs an official term beyond the period contemplated by law. Carroll v. Wall, 35 Kan. 36. If the board of aldermen should be equally divided upon the passage of an ordinance recommended by the mayor in his annual message, it would not be doubted that he could break the tie. We perceive no greater reason for refusing him a casting vote when he has proposed, not a measure of legislation, but a candidate for office.

The tie was created by the vote of Ald. Walsh, which was cast against the confirmation of Mr. Reynolds as his successor in the office of police commissioner. By the rules of order of the board of aldermen, all differences of opinion in regard to modes of proceeding, not otherwise provided for, were to be "governed by parliamentary practice, as set forth in Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies." In that work it is stated (sections 1784, 1789, 1844) to be the common parliamentary rule that no member of a legislative assembly shall vote on any question involving his own character or conduct, his right as a member, or his pecuniary interest; but that an interest of the latter description only exists when it is immediate, particular, and distinct from the public interest; and that (section 1837) the reception of such a vote after the declaration of the result by the presiding officer can only be remedied by formal action of the house in passing a motion for its disallowance. The right of a member of a legislative body to vote on a question involving his right to the seat he holds in it is a very different one from that which arises on a question as to his tenure of some other office. This distinction was strongly emphasized in the discussions arising upon a motion made in the senate of the United States, in 1866, to disallow Senator Stockton's vote upon a resolution declaring him entitled to retain his seat. Senator Foster, then the president of the senate, a distinguished parliamentarian, and afterwards a member of this court, took the ground that the chair had no power to exclude the vote, but that the senate could. During the debate, Senator Sherman, of Ohio, while advocating the motion, in view of Mr. Stockton's peculiar relation to the subject of the resolution for which he had voted, stated that he had himself, on one occasion, as a representative, determined that should his vote, as such, be necessary to secure his own election to another position, for which he had been placed in nomination, his duty to his constituents would require him to give it; and similar views were expressed by Senators Trumbull, of Illinois, and Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland. Cong. Globe, 1st Sess. 39th Cong. 1602, 1636, 1643, 1647; Phillips v. Eyre, L. R. 4 Q. B. 225, 235. It is our opinion that Ald. Walsh had the right to vote against the confirmation of Mr. Reynolds as his successor in the office of police commissioner, and that, even had it been otherwise, his vote, when once given and counted by the mayor in his declaration of the result, could only be rejected by the action of the board of aldermen.

In regard to the notice given of the objects of the meeting, it is enough to say that, with respect to such a body, the specification of certain objects does not exclude action upon any others which are within the range of its general powers. Whitney v. New Haven, 58 Conn. 450, 460.

It follows that Messrs. Walsh and Bogart ceased to be rightful police commissioners upon the qualification of their successors in May, 1891. The removal of the relator from office in June, 1891, by the so-called "board of police commissioners," constituted of Messrs. Grant, Rishor, and Walsh, was therefore a nullity, unless Mr. Walsh was a de facto commissioner. Against such a claim the finding of the superior court is decisive. It is that at no time between May 21 and September 23, 1891, did he have the reputation of being such a commissioner, nor were his acts and authority as a pretended commissioner generally recognized or acquiesced in, nor was he an incumbent of that office under such apparent circumstances of reputation or color as would have led men to suppose that he was a legal commissioner, nor did he exercise the duties of that office under such circumstances of continuance, reputation, acquiescence, or otherwise, as reasonably to authorize the presumption that he was such a commissioner, or as were calculated to induce people, without inquiry, to submit to or invoke his action. The want of notice to either of the rightful commissioners appointed in May, of the meetings of the pretended board of commissioners, would also be a fatal objection to the validity of the sentence of removal, even had Mr. Walsh been a de facto commissioner. It follows that the relator continued to be chief of police until September, 1891.

Upon September 23, 1891, an ordinance was adopted by the common council, which reads as follows: "Be it ordained by the common council of the city of Bridgeport: Section 1. That the office of chief of police be and the same is hereby abolished. Sec. 2. That section 6 of chapter 17, being 'An ordinance relative to the police department,' be and the same is hereby amended by striking out the words 'chief of police' in the second line thereof. Sec. 3. That section 9 of said chapter 17, being 'An ordinance relative to the police department,' be and the same is hereby amended by adding thereto the following: 'If at any time the office of said chief of police be abolished or ceases to exist, then said captain of police shall be vested with all the powers and responsibilities, and shall perform all the duties, formerly exercised by or imposed upon said chief of police by the statutes of the state, the charter and ordinances of the city of Bridgeport, and the rules of the police department of said city.' Sec. 4. All ordinances and parts thereof now in force and inconsistent with any part of this ordinance are hereby repealed." It is obvious that this ordinance was inartificially drawn, but its general purpose is unmistakable. It was designed to abolish the office of chief of police, to amend certain of the ordinances in such a way as to secure the devolution of the functions of the office upon the captain of police, and to repeal all provisions of the ordinances which were inconsistent with the accomplishment of these objects. If this ordinance is to be construed as a mere attempt to remove the incumbent of an office, and appoint another to exercise its functions, it would be void. Farrell v. Bridgeport, 45 Conn. 191, 193. The removal of a chief of police is, by section 58 of the city charter, a matter within the sole jurisdiction of the board of police commissioners. But we are not to presume an improper motive. If the ordinance can be supported as a legitimate exercise by the common council of its authority to make and repeal ordinances with respect to the police, and to the proper regulation of the police department, it is our duty to give it such a construction as will make it operative, and consistent with the charter. West School Dist. of Canton v. Merrills, 12 Conn. 437, 439; Bartlett v. Kinsley, 15 Conn. 327, 331; Beach, Pub. Corp. §§ 516, 517. In the case of State 22 L. R. A.

v. Baldwin, 45 Conn. 184, we held that an act abolishing by one section the board of county commissioners of New Haven county, and by the next section creating a board of commissioners for New Haven county, with the same functions as those of the board which was abolished, was self-destructive, and that there was never a moment when the office of county commissioner for New Haven county was not in continued existence. But in the case before us, after the abolition of an office comes, not the creation of a similar one, but the devolution of its functions, or of some of them, on the incumbent of another office. An ordinance, above quoted, already existed, which provided (section 9) that when, from any cause, the chief of police should be unable to act, the captain should take his place and perform his duties. The framers of the new ordinance were apparently in doubt whether that section would cover the case of the abolition of the office of chief of police, and therefore sought to amend it by making an express provision for that contingency. It was a contingency no longer, for the first and second sections had completed the work of abolition, and their intent would have been better expressed had the amendment of section 9 thrown the powers and duties of the chief of police upon the captain of police, not if the office of the latter should be abolished, but as soon as the ordinance took effect by which it was abolished. That this was the purpose in view seems to us apparent upon a comparison of its different sections, and we think the language used justifies and requires such a construction as will give this purpose effect. Whitlock v. West, 26 Conn. 406, 414. The office of chief of police was one which had been created in 1874 by the ordinance, section 9 of which was thus amended. By section 6 of that ordinance it was provided that "the regular police force of said city shall consist of a chief of police, captain, lieutenant, first and second sergeant, and not less than ten nor more than twenty patrolmen." Out of this section the ordinance of 1891 struck the words "chief of police." This amendment was a return to the scheme of organization for the police force contained in an earlier ordinance adopted in 1872, in which the chief officer of the department was styled "captain of police." Prior to 1872 the officers of the department, under an ordinance adopted in 1869, had been a chief of police, a captain, and two sergeants. An office created by ordinance may be abolished by ordinance. Butler v. Pennsylvania, 51 U. S. 10 How. 402, 416, 13 L. ed. 472, 478; State v. Douglas, 26 Wis. 423, 7 Am. Rep. 87. Neither the city charter nor the general statutes of the state appears to us to contain any such mention of an office of chief of police as to amount to a declaration that an office by that name must necessarily exist in Bridgeport. General Statute, § 1646, after providing that incorrigible offenders, if released from the state's prison on parole, may be recommitted by order of the directors of the prison, makes it "the duty of all chiefs of police and marshals of cities and towns, and the sheriffs of counties, and of all police officers and constables," to execute any such order. Section 2998 provides that "the chief of police of any city" may license junk shops in such city. Section 3000 contains a similar provision as to licensing pawnbrokers, and section 3001 gives power to examine the books and premises of pawnbrokers in any city to "the chief of police of said city or any person by him designated." Section 3106 gives authority to enter and inspect the premises of licensed liquor dealers to "the county commissioners, sheriff of the county, and any deputy sheriff by him specially authorized, the chief of police of any city, or any policeman by him specially authorized." Section 3007 empowers "selectmen in towns and the chief officer of police in cities" to license itinerant medical practitioners. We find nothing in any of these general laws which requires any particular city to maintain an officer known by the special designation of "chief of police." As well might it be contended that section 1646 requires our cities or towns to maintain officers of police to be known as "marshals." The general statutes undoubtedly contemplate the existence of some one official in each city who shall be the head of its police force, or in the language of section 3007, "the chief officer of police;" but as to whether he shall be called "inspector," or by any other name, is left to be determined by the municipal charter or ordinances under which the office may be created. Opinion of the Justices, 117 Mass. 603. The reference to "the chief of police" and "the chief of said police department" in sections 62 and 63 of the Bridgeport charter, already mentioned, seems to us to impose no obligation on the common council to adopt either of these terms for the title of the chief officer of police. The state has dealt with his functions, not his name. An ordinance which deprived the police department of any head would be contrary to the intent of the charter. Had the ordinance now in question abolished, not only the office of chief of police, but also those of captain and lieutenant, and omitted to intrust the powers of chief to any other officer, it would have been void. Had it assumed to remove the incumbent of the office of chief of police while leaving the office itself still in existence, it would have been void. Samis v. King, 40 Conn. 298, 309. But whether the powers and duties properly belonging to the head of the department were by the ordinance, as adopted, transferred to the captain of police from motives of economy, or to terminate an unseemly and long-continued wrangle over official appointments, or to secure any other possible end in the interests of good government, it is enough that they were transferred, and that such transfer was within the jurisdiction of the common council.

There was error in sustaining the demurrer to the fourth paragraph of the amended plea, and for that cause the judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in conformity to this opinion respecting the matters alleged in said paragraph.

NOTE.—Assumption by volunteer of the risks of service.

It seems to be agreed that a master owes a volunteer no higher duty than he owes other servants.

The volunteer can impose on the master no greater liability than he owes to a servant. Ostborne v. Knox & L. R. Co. 68 Me. 49, 28 Am. Rep. 16.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Hennepin County overruling a motion for a new trial after verdict in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries resulting in death and alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. E. Dodge, for appellant.

Evarts was a mere volunteer and assumed all the risks incident to a skilled brakeman engaged in the performance of the same duties and in the same situation.

Church v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 16 L. R. A. 861, 50 Minn. 218.

If Evarts who volunteered to sever the coupling between the dump cars and the first car of stone had been possessed of the knowledge and skill of an ordinary brakeman employed to do similar work, the signal of the conductor to reverse the engine would have been perfectly proper, both with reference to the time when, the manner in which, and the circumstances under which it was given.

A volunteer can impose no greater duty on the master than the master's hired servants, employed and authorized to act in a similar capacity.

On a highway undertook to brake a car and was injured, the court said the injured person was given no better condition legally than if he had been a mere intermeddler. The company owed him no duty either as an employé, passenger, or traveler on a highway crossed by the railroad. Everhart v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. 78 Ind. 292, 41 Am. Rep. 567, 4 Am. & Eng. R. R. A passenger who, at the request of the conductor, goes upon the top of the car to help signal, when there is no real necessity for it, cannot recover if he is injured because of so doing. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Lindley, 6 L. R. A. 643, 42 Kan. 714.

A recovery was denied to a volunteer in Sparks v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co., 32 Ga. 156, but there were in that case other elements which may have contributed to defeat the recovery, such as a failure to show negligence on the part of the company and that the injury was the result of accident.

Liability to minor volunteer.

Liability of the master to a minor volunteer will depend on his discretion and ability to know his danger and avoid it. Rhodes v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 84 Ga. 320.

A boy who, having attempted to steal a ride on a freight train, was discovered by a brakeman and compelled to assist in working the train, cannot recover if he is injured by the brakeman to readjust lumber which has become loose, during the performance of which he is injured by reason of his position and employment. *Sherman v. Where a boy was killed while attempting to assist a fireman in getting water for an engine, the court said the boy was voluntarily where he had no right to be and that he had no right to claim protection, and his parents were not permitted to recover from the company for his death, although the fireman requested the boy to perform the service. *Flower v. Rep. 356, a boy fifteen years old went between moving cars for the purpose of coupling them claiming that he was compelled to do so by threats of the conductor. The court held that if he acted in obedience to threats, the conductor was acting outside the scope of his authority and the company was not liable for injuries received by the boy, and that if he acted voluntarily he was guilty of extraordinary rashness and folly which directly contributed to the injury and barred recovery.

While he was so engaged he was injured by the negligence of another company using the same track. The court held that the father had authority to require the assistance and that the son was not a trespasser, but that he was rightfully on the track and could recover for injuries caused by defendant's negligence.

Church v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. supra.

Conceding that the negligence of Evarts in volunteering to do the work could not preclude a recovery, if, after he had so volunteered, defendant's servant was negligent with knowledge of Evarts' danger, it was certainly for the jury to say whether, after the signal was given, Evart's conduct in remaining where he was until the last moment and then stepping over onto the dump car from which he was thrown off, would not have been negligence in a brakeman skilled and possessing knowledge of the business.

timekeeper, his duties being to keep an account of the time of men at work upon, and to make measurements of materials used in construction work. It was no part of his duty to assist in the operation of trains, nor had any conductor of a train authority to direct or employ him to assist in any such work. Neither had he any experience, as brakeman or otherwise, in the operation of trains. On the day of the accident he was sent by his superior officer from the office to a yard about a mile distant, with an order to the conductor of a construction train to bring certain carloads of stone to a place where construction work was going on. Having delivered this message, he boarded the construction train for the purpose of riding back to the office. The train consisted of thirty-five cars, six flat cars loaded with stone, and twenty-nine empty dump cars. The train was moving easterly, and was made up as follows: At the west end was the engine, with the pilot facing east; then came the dump cars, and then the six cars loaded with stone; the engine facing the cars and pushing them, the stone being on the front end of the train as it moved east. The deceased was riding on the rear car of stone next to the dump cars. When the train approached the destination of the stone, the conductor in charge desired to put the six cars of stone upon one track, and the twenty-nine dump cars upon another parallel track, without bringing any portion of the train to a full stop. This was to be done after the cars had attained a sufficient rate of speed, by uncoupling the stone cars, and then reversing the engine, which would check the speed of the dump cars, while the stone cars would continue at the previous rate of speed, and pass the switch, onto the desired track, before the dump cars reached it. To accomplish this, the conductor signaled the engineer to "kick" the train, in obedience to which the latter pushed the train rapidly ahead at the rate of from seven to ten miles an hour. Immediately upon giving this order to the engineer, the conductor, as the jury found, ordered Evarts to pull the pin between the stone cars and the dump cars, and, in obedience to this order, Evarts stepped down between the stone car and the dump car next to it, and stooped down and pulled the pin. While the evidence is not entirely conclusive on the point, yet it would seem that Evarts, while pulling the pin in this stooping position, stood with one foot on each car. Meanwhile, the conductor had signaled the engineer to reverse his engine. The engineer promptly obeyed. This, of course, suddenly checked the speed of the dump cars with a jerk, as the slack between them was taken up. This jerk occurred while Evarts, still partially in a stooping position, was in the act of straightening himself up, holding the pin in one hand. The consequence was that he was thrown upon the ground, and run over by the cars and killed. The evidence is not very clear whether at this time Evarts still had one foot on each car, or, while in the act of straightening himself up, he had placed both feet on the end of the dump car. The defendant claims that the evidence shows that the latter was the fact. As we view the case, the question is not one of importance; but we think the jury would have been at least justified by the evidence in finding that, so suddenly did the whole thing occur, Evarts was still substantially in the same position when thrown from the cars as when the conductor signaled the engineer to reverse his engine. The evidence was also ample to justify the jury in finding that the conductor knew Evarts' position when he gave the signal to reverse. In any event there is no assignment of error that raises the question of its sufficiency.

The negligence charged against defendant is the act of the conductor in signaling the engineer to reverse the engine when, as is claimed, he either knew, or ought to have known, that the result would be to endanger the life of Evarts. The theory of the law, and doubtless the correct one, upon which the case was submitted to the jury, was that, as to the acts he was then performing, Evarts was a mere volunteer, and that the defendant owed him no contractual duty as master. The learned trial judge, over and over again, in the most explicit manner, instructed the jury that plaintiff could not recover unless the conductor, at the time he gave the signal to reverse the engine, knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care ought to have known, that the giving of the signal "would result in jerking Evarts from the train," "would necessarily produce injury to Evarts," "would result in injury to Evarts." This was but another way of saying that plaintiff could not recover unless, with knowledge that Evarts was in a dangerous position, the conductor, who controlled the movements of the cars, failed to exercise reasonable care to avert the danger. This is the law, even as to trespassers. Heffel v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 49 Minn. 268. This duty rests on no contract obligation, but upon the bare obligation, founded upon the dictates of common humanity, to avoid inflicting a willful or wanton injury on another. Had Evarts been a mere trespasser, and the conductor had seen him in such a position of danger, it would have been the duty of the conductor to exercise reasonable care to avert it, and, if he failed to do so, the defendant would have been liable. We fail to see why a volunteer should have any less rights than a mere trespasser. Because a man is a trespasser or a volunteer, he is not therefore an outlaw, so as to permit others to willfully or recklessly do him an injury. It is no doubt the law, as repeatedly held, that, if a person volunteers to assist the servant of another, the master, as such, owes him no duty; that he assumes all the ordinary risks incident to the situation; and that he cannot recover from the master for an injury caused by a defect in the instrumentalities used, or by the mere negligence of the servants. Church v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 50 Minn. 218, 16 L. R. A. 861.

But it seems to us that this is not inconsistent with the further proposition that if, after discovering such volunteer has placed himself in a position of danger, even through his own negligence the servants fail to exercise reasonable care to avert the danger, the master will be liable. Such must be the law unless, as already suggested, a volunteer occupies a less favorable position than a trespasser. There is nothing in the Church Case inconsistent with this; and, while we have found no case precisely in point, there is nothing inconsistent with it in any of the cases cited by counsel. It is sometimes given as a reason why a master is not liable to a volunteer for the negligence of a servant that a servant cannot, by his officious conduct, impose a greater duty on the master than that which the latter owes his servant, and that a master is not liable to a servant for the negligence of a fellow servant. If there is anything in this "fellow-servant" doctrine that has any bearing on the question, it is at least inapplicable in this state as to railway companies.

It strikes us that the very ingenious argument of counsel for the defendant is all based on one radical fallacy, to wit, that in all respects, and for all purposes, Evarts is to be considered as a skilled and experienced brakeman, and therefore, if he did or failed to do anything which an experienced brakeman, in the exercise of reasonable care, would have done or omitted to do, he was guilty of negligence which would prevent a recovery; also, that if the conductor of the train did nothing that would have been negligent had Evarts been an experienced brakeman, then he was not guilty of any negligence in this instance. To the first part of this proposition it is sufficient answer that the question of Evarts' negligence up to the time the conductor gave the signal to reverse the engine was wholly immaterial under the theory upon which the case was submitted to the jury, to wit, that a recovery could only be had in case the conductor, when he gave the signal, knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care had reason to believe, that Evarts would be imperiled thereby. The court correctly instructed the jury that "although it may be deemed an act of negligence on the part of Evarts to have gone there and performed this duty as a volunteer, because dangerous to any man unaccustomed to perform it, . . . yet if, after he assumed to do that act, even though he was negligent, and the conductor, as a matter of fact, saw him in that perilous position, and gave the order knowing that the effect of the order would be to throw him from the car, then his negligence would not prevent a recovery." To the matter of negligence on the part of Evarts after the conductor signaled the engineer we will refer hereafter. The second branch of the proposition, viz., that the conductor was not negligent if he did nothing but what would have been proper had Evarts been an experienced brakeman, is clearly incorrect. If he knew, as he did, that Evarts was inexperienced, and for that reason in greater peril, it was the conductor's duty to regulate his conduct with reference to that fact. A position might be perilous to a young boy that would not be so to a mature man; and for the same reason the conductor should reasonably have anticipated danger to an inexperienced man like Evarts, when he might not have done so in the case of an experienced brakeman.

The court after charging the jury, as already stated, that, even if Evarts was negligent on account of his inexperience in attempting to perform so dangerous an act, this would not prevent a recovery if, as a matter of fact, the conductor saw him in a perilous position, and gave the order knowing that the effect of it would be to throw him from the car, added: "This, then, is the exception to the rule that the plaintiff cannot recover where he is guilty of contributory negligence; and I think I may say to you there is no evidence of contributory negligence in this case which you need consider." This forms the subject of the fourth assignment of error.

It is undoubtedly true that the action of the conductor is to be judged by the facts existing and known to him when he signaled the engineer, for he was not required to anticipate any subsequent and independent act of negligence on the part of Evarts. But it seems to us quite clear, from a perusal of the record, that the only negligence on the part of Evarts claimed on the trial was that of an inexperienced man attempting to perform an act essentially dangerous. This was evidently the understanding of the trial court, and, if defendant claimed any other and subsequent act of contributory negligence, the attention of the court ought to have been called to it specifically. But in any view of the case we fail to see any evidence of negligence on the part of Evarts other than that of attempting to do a perilous act as to which he was inexperienced,—a fact known to the conductor when he gave the signal.

The only other negligence which defendant claims is that he had placed his feet on the end of the dump car, when he ought, after drawing the pin, to have gotten back upon the stone car, where he would have been safer when the jerk came from letting out the slack. If this were so, it is only what might have been reasonably anticipated from an inexperienced man. But remembering that the burden of proof on this point was on the defendant, and that there is no evidence that Evarts knew, or had reason to suppose, that the signal to reverse the engine would be given so soon, and the further fact that the whole thing was done so quickly that he had not yet had time to regain an erect posture after stooping over to take out the pin, we do not think that the jury would have been justified in finding the specific act of negligence now claimed, even if the question had been submitted to them.

When the jury returned into court for further instructions the judge charged them that unless they could answer the third question intelligently they ought not to, and could not, give a general verdict, because the whole case depended on that question. The question referred to was: "Did the conductor know, or in the exercise of ordinary care have reason to believe, that Evarts would be imperiled by the signal to reverse the engine?" It is contended that this was erroneous, for the reason that it was an instruction that they could not render a verdict for the defendant unless they could answer this question. Of course, the instruction is subject to this verbal criticism; but what the court evidently meant was that no verdict for the plaintiff could be rendered unless the jury could answer the question in the affirmative, and it is impossible that they could have understood the instruction otherwise.

Order affirmed.

1. Permitting witnesses to give an opinion as to the amount of damage inflicted on abutting property by the construction of a viaduct in a street is not reversible error, where the jury is instructed that the damage will be the difference in the value of the property before such construction and immediately afterwards.
2. A street dedicated to the public for ordinary purposes cannot be appropriated for the construction of a viaduct which completely destroys its use for street purposes, without liability for damages to abutting owners.
3. In estimating the benefits which may be set off against a claim by the owner of lots abutting on a highway for damages resulting from the construction of a viaduct in the street only those can be considered which particularly affect the lots damaged, and not such as are shared in common with other lots not damaged.
4. The right to the use of the street in front of abutting lots is property within the protection of a constitutional provision against taking property without compensation.

CERTIFICATION by the Kansas City Court of Appeals for the opinion of the Supreme Court of an appeal from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jackson County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to and depreciation in value of plaintiffs' real estate by reason of the erection by defendants of a viaduct in the street in front of the property. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Pratt, Ferry & Hagerman, for appellant:

It is reversible error to permit the question to be asked calling for the opinion of the witness as to the amount of the damage.

It is really erroneous to permit a witness to answer as to what caused the damage or whether the property is benefited.

Muff v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 22 Mo. App. 584; Daleell v. Davenport, 12 Iowa, 437; Church v. Milwaukee, 81 Wis. 512.

The true measure of damages was the difference in the market value.

If the true measure of damages be the difference in the market value, benefits, whether general or special, must be considered.

Swenson v. Lexington, 69 Mo. 157; Slatten v. Des Moines Valley R. Co. 29 Iowa, 148, 4 Am. Rep. 205.

A witness, in this kind of a case, cannot give his opinion as to the amount of damages, but must confine himself to the question of values, leaving the jury to determine therefrom, in the light of the instructions, whether such difference in value constituted the damage.

If a witness in arriving at his opinion of the damage could illegally consider in his own mind questions about which the parties were contesting, manifestly the question would be improper. Under the constitution the building of the street-car line was a proper street use (Ransom v. Citizens R. Co. 104 Mo. 375; Henry Gauss & S. Mfg. Co. v. St. Louis, K. & N. W. R. Co. 18 L. R. The construction of the viaduct was substantially equivalent to a change of grade, so much so in fact that, had there been no constitutional provision there would have been a cause of action on a statute authorizing a recovery for change of grade.

The street having been put to a street use, the true question is whether, in ascertaining the damages provided for by article 2, section 21, of the Constitution of 1875, general as well as special benefits are to be considered in determining the difference in the market value of the property.

The measure of damages is simply the difference in market value.

Chicago v. Taylor, 125 U. S. 161, 31 L. ed. 638; Chouteau v. St. Louis, 8 Mo. App. 48; Taylor v. Kansas City Cable R. Co. 38 Mo. App. 668; Atlanta v. Green, 67 Ga. 386; *Moore v. If the difference in market value is the measure of recovery it is plain that all advantages, where special or general, are to be taken into consideration. So the authorities with uniformity say.

These cases concisely state the distinction between such a case as this and where property is absolutely appropriated for public use,—as said in Church v. Milwaukee, supra.

Here there is no offsetting of benefits, because no property is taken. The simple question is whether general benefits are to be considered in ascertaining the depreciation in value. Whatever the rule may be in cases where land is taken, there is a clear distinction under the facts of this case, and so nearly all the cases show.

Burgess, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action for damages to an abutting lotowner for building the Twelfth Street Viaduct & Cable Railway Line. There was a trial by jury, and a verdict in favor of plaintiffs for $800. After an unsuccessful motion for new trial, the case was appealed to the Kansas City court of appeals, and from that court certified to this court upon the ground that a constitutional question is involved.

Catharine Spencer was the owner of lots 5 and 6, in block 57, Turner & Co's addition to Kansas City. The lots were in what were known as "short blocks," being bounded on the north by Eleventh street, and on the south by Twelfth street. The lots are each 24 feet in width and 35 feet in depth. The defendant was authorized by the city to build a viaduct, and lay its street-car line along Twelfth street. This viaduct was the approach to the Twelfth street incline, by which the cable line runs from the low ground in the bottom to the bluff. The contention of plaintiffs is that this structure was a change of grade, within the meaning of article 2, § 21, Const. 1875, which provides that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation. The claim of plaintiffs is, that, in the construction of that part of the Twelfth Street Cable Railway, that part of said street on which plaintiffs' property abuts southward was totally destroyed, so that it could not be used by plaintiffs in connection with said lots. Some of the witnesses testified as to the value of the lots before the construction of the viaduct, and also afterwards; and some of them, who were introduced on the part of plaintiffs, testified, over the objections and exceptions of defendant, as to the amount of damages plaintiffs sustained, how they were damaged, and what caused such damage. To allow a witness to give his opinion as to the amount of damages sustained in any given case is, as a general rule, usurping the province of the jury, and determining for them a question of which they are peculiarly the judges, and for which purpose they are selected in all cases sounding in damages, and where there is a trial by jury. This is the rule announced by this court in the case of Hurt v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 94 Mo. 255; Belch v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 18 Mo. App. 80; White v. Stoner, Id. 540. And especially is this true when the inquiry is in reference to future damages. Hurt v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co., supra, and authorities cited. In the cases of Springfield & S. R. Co. v. Calkins, 90 Mo. 538, and Nevada & M. R. Co. v. DeLissa, 103 Mo. 125, witnesses were allowed to give their opinions as to values, after having stated their knowledge of the property, and it was held not to be error. The better rule seems to be that they should only state facts, and to leave entirely to the jury the question of damages. This however, was not reversible error in this case, as the measure of damages was fixed by instruction No. 4, given on behalf of defendant, which states the damages to be the difference in the value of the lots before the construction of the viaduct, and immediately afterwards. The same may be said with reference to the evidence of the witnesses as to what caused the damage, or whether or not the property was benefited. It was not reversible error, under the facts in this case. This is not a proceeding to condemn private property for public use by the exercise of the power of the right of eminent domain, but is simply an action ex delicto, and is not like the laying of a railroad track on the surface of a street, thereby imposing an additional servitude, or making a new and improved public use thereof. It amounts to a total destruction of the street. The street, having been dedicated to public use for ordinary purposes, could not be lawfully appropriated to another distinct and inconsistent public use. Belcher Sugar Ref. Co. v. St. Louis Grain Elev. Co. 82 Mo. 121, and authorities cited.

While contrary opinions have been maintained with great ability in courts of other states, and by elementary writers of much distinction, the rule in this state is well established that in cases of this kind, in estimating benefits, the jury should be restricted, in estimating such benefits, to peculiar and direct benefits, or increase of value, as result to the lots in controversy, in which other lots in the same locality do not participate. The advantages to be considered by the jury are such as particularly affect the lots of plaintiffs, and are not advantages of a general nature, which the plaintiffs, in common with their neighbors, whose lots are not damaged, derive from the construction of the viaduct. Lee v. Tebo & N. R. Co. 53 Mo. 178; Hosher v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 60 Mo. 308; Combs v. Smith, 78 Mo. 32; Chicago, S. F. & C. R. Co. v. McGrew, 104 Mo. 282, and authorities cited.

The right of the plaintiffs to the use of the street adjoining their lots is as much property as the lots themselves. Lackland v. North Missouri R. Co. 31 Mo. 180; Householder v. City of Kansas, 83 Mo. 488; Sheehy v. Kansas City Cable R. Co. 94 Mo. 574; Chicago v. Taylor, 125 U. S. 165, 31 L. ed. 640; Tate v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 64 Mo. 149.

We are unable to see even a plausible reason for complaint by defendant of the instructions of the court in this case, as the only instructions given as to the measure of damages were given at its request, and by the court of its own motion, which were in harmony with each other, and with the views herein expressed. There was no error in refusing instructions asked by defendant, as those given presented the case to the jury manifestly fair, and remarkably favorable to defendant, and the plaintiffs are not complaining.

The judgment is affirmed.

All concur.

the period of ten years next ensuing after the date of this agreement." Crane had been a manufacturer of fire alarm and police telegraph apparatus from the year 1856 to 1886, when the contract was entered into which is the subject of this suit. From the year 1879 to January, 1891, he was a director of the plaintiff company. In 1881 he, or the firm of which he was a member, entered into a contract with the plaintiff company to do all of its manufacturing. He testified that the company "was to have the use of patents of mine for the term of ten years, and to give all its manufacturing to Moses C. Crane or Crane & Co., and they agreed not to compete with the Gamewell Company during that time." This is the contract which was annulled by the contract in suit. By the contract in suit Crane sold and conveyed to the company all his machinery, tools, draw cases, and other property used in or connected with his business of manufacturing for said company, including "stock supplies partly manufactured, and raw material of every kind in any way pertaining" to said business of manufacturing in his factory at Newton Highlands, in Massachusetts, and he agreed to transfer to said company exclusive rights under and control of all letters patent for fire alarm and police apparatus only, owned or controlled wholly or in part by him, together with exclusive rights under and control of all improvements in said fire alarm and police apparatus only, made by him up to the date of the contract, and he gave to said company the "first option to purchase or obtain exclusive control for fire alarm and police purposes only, under any and all letters patent, improvements applicable to such apparatus which may be made by said Crane during the term of ten years next ensuing after the date of this agreement," etc. The consideration to be paid was $30,000 in cash and notes, and such unwrought stock, machinery, etc., as was on hand at the date of the transfer, and was not included in the schedule attached to the contract, was also to be paid for at the "cost price, to be fixed by appraisal." Crane also agreed to let his factory to the company at a reasonable rent if the company desired to hire it. The company actually paid Crane about $47,000 as the consideration of the contract and the property conveyed.

The plaintiff contends that the agreement "not to engage in the business of manufacturing or selling fire alarm or police telegraph machines and apparatus, and not to enter into competition with said Gamewell Company, either directly or indirectly, for the period stricted to locality, will be void. Callahan v. Donnelly, 45 Cal. 152, 13 Am. Rep. 172; Wiley v. Baumgardner, 97 Ind. 66, 49 Am. Rep. 427; Bishop v. Palmer, 146 Mass. 469.

And in Saratoga County Bank v. King, 44 N. Y. 87, it was conceded by both parties and stated by the court that a contract of sale, restraining the vendor from engaging in the same business for thirty years, and not restricted as to place was void.

Where the trade was world wide and an agent contracted not to enter like business for three years after retirement, nor to give information, this was held under the circumstances to be reasonable,—the court putting it on the ground, "You, the plaintiff, shall have a breathing time during which we will abstain from using the knowledge we have acquired." Badische Anilin und Soda Fabrik v. Schott [1892] W. N. 183, [1892] 3 Ch. 447. See Hinde v. Gray, 1 Mann. & G. 195, 1 Scott, N. R. 123, 4 Jur. 302.

Publications.

The sale of the interest of an author or publisher in a journal, magazine, paper, or literary work with an agreement not to publish a similar work, will be protected and the contract upheld. Brooke v. Chitty, 2 Coop. 1, Cottenham, 216; Ingram v. Stiff, 5 Jur. N. S. 947, 33 L. T. 196; Ainsworth v. Bentley, 14 Week. Rep. 530; Presbury v. Fisher, 18 Mo. 50.

So where the author sold a copyright and contracted not to publish any other work to prejudice of it, the contract will be valid even if there is no piracy. Barfield v. Nicholson, 2 Sim. & Stu. 1, 2 L. J. Ch. 90.

Secrets of trade, compounds, and medicine.

A contract of sale of secret processes of manufacture or composition of matter or machinery used in trade, which restrains the vendor from using the same or imparting his knowledge to others or selling the same articles, will be generally upheld as a reasonable contract. Hagg v. Darley, 47 L. J. Ch. N. S. 587, 38 L. T. N. S. 812; Bryson v. Whitehead, 1 Sim. & Stu. 74, 1 L. J. Ch. 42; Alcock v. Gilbertson, 5 Duer. 76; Jarvis v. Peck, Hoffm. And where the vendor sold the exclusive right to make a compound with the trade-mark and agreed not to use the name of the vendor on any similar preparation, the use of his name by him on sale of similar drugs will be restrained. Brewer v. Lamar, 69 Ga. 655, 47 Am. Rep. 766; Gillis v. Hall, 2 Brewst. 342, 7 Phila. 423.

But specific performance will not be enforced in favor of vendee on a sale of medicine compounded by secret process where the vendee obtains the sole and exclusive right to purchase, but does not bind himself to purchase any definite quantity. Barnes v. McAllister, 18 How. Pr. 584.

And an injunction against disclosure of secret process by vendor was refused where other remedy was provided by the contract. Nessle v. Reese, 20 How. Pr. 382.

And an injunction against the disclosure of secret process of making a compound was refused where the vendee had failed to keep his part of the contract. New York Chemical Co. v. Halleck, 15 N. Y. Supp. 517.

And an agreement not to manufacture or sell "said liquid extract, Enothera," will not prevent the manufacture and sale of other preparations from the same herb, made in a different manner and possessing different qualities which all druggists could make. Garrison v. Nuts, 37 Ill. 215.

And in Williams v. Williams, 8 Meriv. 157, an injunction to prevent a partner from disclosing a secret medicine for the eye was refused, but no question as to restraint of trade was discussed and the court held that no secret was involved. Patented articles.

This subdivision is not intended to include matters as to the patent laws, or rights acquired under letters patent, but only contracts of sale in which the question of monopoly or restraint of trade arises out of the contract itself as in the main case.

of ten years," etc., is not void as being in restraint of trade—First, because it is an agreement pertaining to "property and business protected by patents;" secondly, because the restraint is coextensive only with the business sold, and is necessary to enable the company to enjoy fully what it has bought and paid for; and, thirdly, because it relates to a single commodity, not of prime necessity, and not a staple of commerce. See Central Shade Roller Co. v. Cushman, 143 Mass. 353; Morse Twist Drill & Mach. Co. v. Morse, 103 Mass. 73, 4 Am. Rep. 513; Gloucester Ironglass & Glue Co. v. Russia Cement Co. 154 Mass. 92, 12 L. R. A. 563. There seems to be no reason why the defendant Crane should not assign the patents and inventions which he agreed to assign, if there are any, and no serious objection has been raised by the defendant on this part of the case. The defendant contends that he has a right to assist in forming a corporation, and to act as one of its officers, the business of which is to manufacture and sell fire alarm and police telegraph machines which are not made under any patents owned by the plaintiff, or under any patents which he has agreed to assign to the plaintiff, or which the plaintiff has elected to purchase, under the option given in the contract, even although by so doing he enters into competition with the plaintiff in its business. He, in effect, concedes that, so far as the business is protected by patents which he has assigned or agreed to assign, the restraint is valid. It appears that there are "a dozen or fifteen concerns in the United States engaged in a somewhat similar business." The defendant testified that he looked up the number of patents pertaining to this branch of the art in 1881, and that there were then about 500. The defendant contends that he ought to be able to use his own patents for subsequent improvements applicable to such apparatus if the plaintiff does not elect to purchase them; that he was previously a manufacturer of fire alarm and police telegraph apparatus, and not a seller thereof; that the good will which attached to his business was that of a manufacturer who did not sell his manufactures in the market; and that it is against public policy that he should be restrained from exercising his peculiar skill anywhere in the United States or in the world for the period of ten years. The apparatus as the defendant contends, which he has a right to manufacture and sell is not secret machinery, and is not protected by any patents which the plaintiff owns or has a right to control, but is apparatus either not protected by patents at all, or by patents of his own, or of some other persons who may choose to employ the defendant. The only ground,

A sale of business of manufacturing patented machinery, whereby vendor contracted not "to manufacture, sell, or cause to be sold any sand-papery machines of any description" unless with consent of vendor, is void, as it is unlimited as to time, place, or circumstances and does not relate to business secrets, trade-marks, or patents. Berlin Mach. Works v. Perry, 71 Wis. 486.

This case is in harmony with the main case and quite similar except that it is not limited as to time.

But a contract not to make any other machines, during the life of a patent, except such as are covered by the same, which is assigned to the vendee, will be sustained. Jones v. Lees, 1 Hurlst. & N. 189, 26 L. J. Exch. 9, 2 Jur. N. S. 645.

And a sale of business and patents where the vendors agreed not to engage in business in opposition will be valid, and an advertising gift of similar articles will be a fraud on the rights of the vendee. Mackinnon Pen Co. v. Fountain Ink Co. 16 Jones & S. 442.

So a contract by the vendor not to do any act which may injure the vendee in his business will be upheld, where the plaintiff was to have the right to purchase all future improvements in machinery made by vendor. Morse Twist Drill & Mach. Co. v. Morse, 103 Mass. 73, 4 Am. Rep. 512.

So where the vendor of business and patents for making guns and ammunition, covenanted for twenty-five years not to engage in trade or business of manufacture of guns, gunmountings, gunpowder, ammunition, or competing business, provided that the restriction should not apply to other explosives than gunpowder or other business and vendee to have the benefit of the defendant's inventions, it was held to be a reasonable and valid contract. Maxim-Nordenfeldt Guns & A. Co. v. Nordenfeldt [1893] 1 Ch. 630.

And a compromise of a suit for infringement of a patent whereby a party for a license for a certain time agreed not to manufacture "cemented hams of any kind without your consent during the existence of your patent" was valid and was consistent with the meaning of "similar cemented hams." Billings v. Ames, 32 Mo. 265.

The joint owner of a patent may stipulate that one alone shall conduct the business. Kinsman v. Parkhurst, 60 U. S. 18 How. 299, 15 L. ed. 335.

Contracts of purchase.

A contract by which the vendor is to control the market or trade at that place is invalid. Arnot v. Pittston & E. Coal Co. 68 N. Y. 558, 23 Am. Rep. 190, reversing 2 Hun. 501; Crawford v. Wick, 18 Ohio St. 190, 98 Am. Dec. 103; Pacific Factor Co. v. Adler, 90 Cal. 1110.

But a contract by a mining company with merchants to furnish them the trade of their miners for a proportion of the sales, is not void as it is restricted to that place and is violated by opening a rival store. George v. East Tennessee Coal Co. 15 Lea, 455, 54 Am. Rep. 425.

And a contract of sale by which the vendor limits the manner by fixing the prices at which he may buy and sell a certain article is not a restriction on trade and is valid if based on a sufficient consideration. Long v. Towl, 42 Mo. 545, 97 Am. Dec. 355.

So a contract binding the vendee to use exclusively articles of vendor's manufacture is not void. Brown v. Rounsavell, 78 Ill. 599; Ebling v. Bauer, 17 N. Y. Week. Dig. 497; Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. Pullman Southern Car Co. 139 U. S. 79, 35 L. ed. 97.

But a contract to handle only the beer of the vendor's make will not be enforced unless good beer is provided. Holcombe v. Hewson, 2 Campb 301; Thornton v. Sherratt, 8 Taunt. 529.

And a contract to take beer of A. only is avoided when A. sells his brewery to C. who removes it some two miles farther distant. Doe v. Reid, 10 Barn. & C. 849.

This note is intended to include matters about sales only, and cases of "contracts for employment;" "covenants running with the land;" "sale of good will;" or "monopoly associations,"—are not included.

then, on which this restriction can be maintained is that it is reasonably necessary for the beneficial enjoyment by the plaintiff of the property it bought of the defendant, or, if this is not so, that the law in modern times does not regard such an agreement as against public policy. So far as we are aware, in every modern case in this commonwealth, except one, where a contract in restraint of trade has been held valid, the restriction has been limited as to space.

In Taylor v. Blanchard, 18 Allen, 370, 90 Am. Dec. 203, the parties entered into a partnership for carrying on "the trade or business of manufacturing shoe cutters," and it was provided that "at whatever time the said copartnership shall be determined and ended" the defendant "shall not, nor will at any time or times hereafter, either alone or jointly with or as agent for any person or persons whomsoever, set up, exercise, or carry on the said trade or business of manufacturing and selling shoe cutters at any place within the aforesaid commonwealth of Massachusetts, and shall not, nor will set up, make, or encourage any opposition to the said trade or business hereafter to be carried on" by the plaintiff. The manufacture of shoe cutters was an art, which could be carried on only by persons instructed in it, and the business was confined to the plaintiff and three other persons; but the court held the agreement void.

In Bishop v. Palmer, 146 Mass. 469, the plaintiff, being engaged in the manufacturing and selling of bedquilts and comfortable, conveyed to the defendant his "entire business plant and enterprise as a manufacturer of and dealer in bedquilts and comfortable," together with the good will of the business, and all the machinery, implements, and utensils used by him in said business, and agreed "that for and during the period of five years from the date hereof he will not, either directly or indirectly, in his own name or in the name of any other person or persons, continue in, carry on, or engage in the business of manufacturing or dealing in bedquilts or comfortable, or of any business of which that may form any part." It was held that this was clearly illegal and void as being in restraint of trade, because not limited as to space. See also Alger v. Thacher, 19 Pick. 51, 31 Am. Dec. 119; Pierce v. Fuller, 8 Mass. 223, 226, 5 Am. Dec. 102; Perkins v. Lyman, 9 Mass. 522; Stearns v. Barrett, 1 Pick. 443, 11 Am. Dec. 223; Palmer v. Stebbins, 3 Pick. 188, 15 Am. Dec. 204; Gilman v. Dwight, 13 Gray, 356, 74 Am. Dec. 634; Angier v. Webber, 14 Allen, 211, 93 Am. Dec. 748; Dean v. Emerson, 102 Mass. 480; Dwight v. Hamilton, 113 Mass. 175; Boutelle v. Smith, 116 Mass. 111; Ropes v. Upton, 125 Mass. 258; Handforth v. Jackson, 150 Mass. 149.

The case of Morse Twist Drill & Mach. Co. v. Morse, supra, is the case referred to as an exception. The question arose upon demurrer. The agreement of the defendant was not only to transfer his patents, machinery, etc., and all improvements and inventions, but "that he will use his best efforts for the perfecting of improvements in the business and manufacture, and for such alterations and combinations as may tend to insure the success of the same and of the company," and that he "will do no act that may injure the company or its business, and that he will at no time aid, assist, or encourage in any manner any competition against the same." He also agreed "to serve as the superintendent of the company for three years," etc. The plaintiff company was formed by the defendant and others, and the defendant's business was transferred to it. He was a stockholder, and was made superintendent. The plaintiff agreed to employ the defendant for three years, and he was actually employed as superintendent up to the time he entered upon a competing business. The case seems to have been decided on the ground that the defendant had agreed to give to the plaintiff his exclusive services with reference to his mechanical skill and ingenuity in all improvements, alterations, and combinations which would tend to insure the success of the plaintiff in manufacturing twist drills and collets. The court says that "the same principle that enables a partner to bind himself to do nothing in competition with the business of the firm ought to apply to him." The opinion proceeds to consider the English cases where the restriction was held not to extend beyond the good will of the business which was the subject of the sale, or was not greater than the interests of the vendee required, and was not unreasonable in view of all the circumstances. This doctrine, in England, has been carried very far. See Davies v. Davies, L. R. 36 Ch. Div. 359.

In this country the courts generally have not gone so far, but the old law has been a good deal modified in some jurisdictions in view of modern methods of doing business. See Oregon Steam Nav. Co. v. Winsor, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 64, 22 L. ed. 315; Fowle v. Park, 131 U. S. 88, 33 L. ed. 67; Ellerman v. Chicago Junction R. & Union Stockyards Co. 49 N. J. Eq. 217; Western Wooden-Ware Assn. v. Starkey, 84 Mich. 76, 11 L. R. A. 503; Matthews v. Associated Press of State of N. Y. 136 N. Y. 333; Oliver v. Gilmore, 53 Fed. Rep. 562; Diamond Match Co. v. Roeber, 106 N. Y. 473, 60 Am. Rep. 464; Whitney v. Slayton, 40 Me. 224.

In the present case the plaintiff did not buy the good will of a mercantile business, and the defendant Crane had no customers for fire alarm and police telegraph machines and apparatus. The plaintiff gets everything it bought if it gets the tangible property and the letters patent and the improvements which the defendant Crane agreed to convey. The stipulation that Crane will not for ten years manufacture or sell fire alarm or police telegraph machines and apparatus, although under patents, in which case it has refused to buy, or under no patent at all, will tend to give the plaintiff a monopoly of the business. To exclude a person from manufacturing or selling anywhere in the United States or in the world machinery designed for certain purposes, in which that person has acquired great skill, may operate to impair his means of earning a living. The stipulation seems to us to be something more than is reasonably necessary to protect the plaintiff in the enjoyment of the property it bought, even if that should be adopted as the test, upon which we express no opinion. The principal object of the stipulation was, we think, to prevent the manufacture or sale by the defendant of any instruments which would serve the same purpose as those made and sold by the plaintiff, and thus to enable the plaintiff more completely to control the market. Large cities and towns cannot well do without some kind of fire alarm and police telegraph apparatus, and it is an article of necessity for such municipalities. We are of the opinion that under our decisions the stipulation must be pronounced void as against public policy. If there is to be a change in the law, as heretofore many times declared by this court, we think it is for the legislature to make it. See Pacific Factor Co. v. Adler, 90 Cal. 110; Taylor v. Saurman, 110 Pa. 8; Richardson v. Buhl, 77 Mich. 632, 6 L. R. A. 457; Herreshoff v. Boutineau, 17 R. I. 3, 8 L. R. A. 469; Strait v. National Harrow Co. 18 N. Y. Supp. 224; Anderson v. Jett, 89 Ky. 375, 6 L. R. A. 390; Urmston v. Whitelegg Bros. 63 L. T. N. S. 455; Perla v. Saalfeld [1892] 3 Ch. 149.

For these reasons a majority of the court are of opinion that the decree against Crane should be substantially affirmed as to the assignment of patents and inventions and as to costs, and should be reversed as to the rest. The decree in favor of Cole should be affirmed.

So ordered.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

NORFOLK & BALTIMORE STEAMBOAT CO., Appt.

(118 N. C. 147.)

1. It is sufficient ground for the dissolution of a corporation that it has removed its principal place of business and all of its agencies from the state of its creation, in contravention of the policy of the state as evinced by its general system of legislation.

2. A proceeding for the dissolution of a corporation in which the summons is improperly made returnable in term before the court may properly be remanded for the purpose of amending the summons so as to make it returnable before the clerk on a day certain.

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the Superior Court for Martin County appointing a receiver with a view to its dissolution. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James E. Moore for appellant.

Mr. Don Gilliam for appellee.

Shepherd, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This proceeding is brought for the purpose of obtaining a decree of dissolution against the defendant company, and the most important question to be considered is whether the complaint sets forth facts sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to the relief prayed for. The defendant was incorporated under the general act for the formation of corporations (Code, chap. 16), and it is therein provided, among other things, that all corporations so created may be dissolved by "special proceedings" instituted by any corporator "for any abuse of its powers to the injury of the plaintiff or of the corporators, or of its creditors or debtors." Section 694. The articles of incorporation provide that the business of the defendant shall be the "transportation of produce and merchandise and all other kinds of freight and passengers to and from the various landings on the Roanoke river in North Carolina to and from the cities of Norfolk, in Virginia, and Baltimore, in Maryland, and to and from said cities to the said landings, and to and from all other points intermediate between said river and said cities; and its principal place of business shall be at Williamston," in this state. The plaintiff, who is one of the corporators, alleges that in 1887 the control and management of the defendant corporation passed into the hands of nonresident stockholders, "since which time the original aim and purpose of said corporation has been departed from, the value of the company's property greatly depreciated, the business fallen away, and its general affairs gradually, but steadily, grown worse." It is further alleged "that for more than a year now past the defendant company has altogether ceased to operate said ports, or any of them, within this state; that no single agency or place of business has been maintained within this state, and that the town of Williamston has been absolutely discontinued as the principal place of business of said company, as required by said article of incorporation." "It is a tacit condition of a grant to a corporation that the grantees shall act up to the end or design for which they are incorporated; and hence, through neglect or abuse of its franchises, a corporation may forfeit its charter as for condition broken, or for breach of trust. The duties assigned by an act of incorporation are conditions annexed to the grant of the franchises conferred (Ang. & A. Corp. § 776), and duties implied are equally obligatory with duties expressed, and their breach is visited by the same consequences." Atty-Gen. v. Petersburg & R. R. Co. 28 N. C. 456; Field, Priv. Corp. 456, note.

It has been held, without reference to any express provision of law or specific requirement of the charter, that it is the duty of a corporation to keep its principal place of business, its books and records, and its principal officers, within the state which incorporated it, to an extent necessary to the fullest jurisdiction and visitatorial power of the state and its courts, and the efficient exercise thereof in all proper cases which concern said corporation. State v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W.

NOTE.—There seems to be little direct authority on the point above decided, and this is reviewed in the opinion of the court.

R. Co. 45 Wis. 579. In commenting upon this decision, Mr. Morawetz (Priv. Corp. 361) says: "This doctrine is correct only provided the legislature has expressed the policy of the state by some special enactment, or by a general system of legislation regarding incorporated companies. There is no such rule at common law. It is always implied in the grant of a charter of incorporation, where there is no indication to the contrary, that the company shall have its central office or place of management in the state under whose laws it was organized. This however, is merely a rule applicable to the construction of charters in determining the intention of the corporators and of the state, and is not an arbitrary rule of law." Accepting the principle as thus modified, and applying it to a corporation doing business, like the defendant, exclusively under a charter granted in this state, it would seem very clear that by the policy of our laws, as indicated by "general system of legislation," the duty referred to is imposed upon the defendant. We have many statutes which plainly contemplate that such a corporation shall keep its principal place of business—certainly some of its agencies—within the limits of the state. Of such are sections 362 and 363 of the Code, relating to the attachment of shares of stock in corporations, and the interests and profits thereon, and authorizing the service of a certified copy of the warrant of attachment on "the president or other head of the association or corporation, or with the secretary, cashier, or managing agent thereof." Of such also are the provisions of section 694, Id., authorizing the dissolution of the corporation upon the return of an execution unsatisfied upon a judgment docketed in the superior court of the county "where it has its only or principal place of business." Reference may also be had to the visitatorial powers conferred upon the board of railroad commissioners, which, together with other provisions of the law, clearly show that a corporation of this character cannot entirely withdraw all of its officers and agencies from the state. The decision in State v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co., supra, was based to some extent upon similar statutory provisions, and the general principle of that case has been here discussed for the purpose of showing that the express provision of the charter of the defendant, requiring its principal place of business to be at Williamston, in this state, may well be sustained by the general policy of our laws. The case is also direct authority that such a violation by a corporation of its charter is "an abuse and misuser of its corporate powers," and is within the spirit and meaning of our statute upon the subject. Without considering, then, the other causes assigned in the complaint, we are of the opinion that the persistent violation of the charter in withdrawing, as alleged, the principal place of business from Williamston, and all of its agencies from the state, would authorize the court to decree a dissolution of the defendant corporation. Atty-Gen. v. Petersburg & R. R. Co. supra.

The summons in this proceeding was improperly made returnable to the superior 22 L. R. A.

court in term, and his honor remanded the proceeding, with directions that the summons be amended so as to make it returnable before the clerk on a day certain. This order, together with the other directions to the clerk, is fully sustained by the principle laid down in Epps v. Flowers, 101 N. C. 153. The judgment must be affirmed.

STATE of North Carolina

(118 N. C. 669.)

1. The burden of showing that a person is illegally detained, when held under a regular mittimus, is upon the prisoner, as the mittimus is sufficient, prima facie, to show legal detention.
2. The presumption of innocence does not apply on an application for a writ of habeas corpus by one held under a commitment.

(November 23, 1893.)

NOTE.—Presumption of innocence in habeas corpus proceedings.

In those jurisdictions in which the question of the innocence of a prisoner is not open to consideration in a habeas corpus proceeding there is evidently no room for any presumption as to innocence.

Thus in People v. Bulloff, 5 Park. Crim. Rep. 77, it is held that the question of innocence is not open in a habeas corpus proceeding.

In this class of cases if there can be said to be any presumption at all on the question the indictment is held for the purpose of the proceeding, to raise a conclusive presumption of guilt.

So in People v. Dixon, 4 Park. Crim. Rep. 651, it is said there is no presumption of innocence after an indictment in a habeas corpus proceeding, and that this presumption, so far as the application is concerned, "has ceased, if not given place to the presumption of guilt."

And where an indictment for murder was held to create a presumption of guilt sufficient to preclude any inquiry into the merits of the case on habeas corpus, it was expressly held that the presumption of innocence was in no sense trenching upon. State v. Brewster, 35 La. Ann. 605.

Although nothing is said about the presumption of innocence or burden of proof in Lynch v. People, 38 Ill. 494, it is implied that there is no presumption of innocence in a habeas corpus proceeding to obtain bail after indictment for murder, as the court says that in view of such an indictment courts and judges "should proceed with great caution in their examination of the facts that a prisoner may not be improperly admitted to bail, and only in case he is clearly entitled to such relief."

Where the question of innocence is permitted to be raised the doctrine has become established by all the cases on the subject that an applicant for habeas corpus to procure bail, when held under an indictment, has the burden of showing that he is entitled to bail, and a prima facie case against him is made by an indictment for a capital offense, such as murder. Ex parte Johnson, 30 Tex. CERTIORARI to review a decision of Bryan, J., refusing to discharge petitioners from custody upon a writ of habeas corpus. Dismissed.

Petitioners were arrested and brought before a justice of the peace upon an affidavit and warrant for unlawfully disposing of mortgaged property under Code, § 1089. They were bound over to the superior court in the sum of $200. For failure to give bond, they were sent to jail under a regular mittimus. The petitioners applied to the judge of the superior court for a writ of habeas corpus, alleging that there was no evidence before the justice that any crime had been committed in his county, and that the committal was made through his ignorance and malpractice. Upon the return the sheriff relied on the mittimus as the cause of detention. The case was continued over night that the solicitor might have time to examine into the matter. The burden was placed on petitioners to show that they were illegally restrained of their liberty, and they refusing to proceed with their evidence, the court refused to discharge them and they were permitted to go upon the bond already given.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. George M. Lindsay and E. C. Smith for petitioners.

Mr. Frank L. Osborne, Atty. Gen., for the State.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The learned counsel for the petitioners properly and frankly admitted that this was a case of "novel impression." The continuance of the hearing till the next morning was not subject to exception. It is difficult to see how it injured the petitioners, who

The same rule applies after an indictment for rape, where the offense is punishable by death. Ex parte Dusenberry, 97 Mo. 504.

So one under indictment for assault to murder is subject to the same presumption on application for bail. Ex parte Ryan, 44 Cal. 555.

The statement in the main case that it is one of "novel impression" is evidently to be taken as referring to a situation in which the prisoner applying for habeas corpus is held under a commitment by a magistrate instead of being held under an indictment, as the cases above cited show that the question of presumption of innocence has been decided by several courts on application by a person held under indictment. But even in respect to persons held under a magistrate's commitment the question is not entirely new.

In Ex parte Scoggin, supra, although that was a case of indictment, the court says that the same rule applies to a person held by warrant of commitment from an examining court for a capital offense as if he were held under an indictment.

And in Ex parte McGlawn, 75 Ala. 33, a person held under commitment by a magistrate for hog stealing was considered subject to the presumption, and the commitment was regarded as making a prima facie case for his detention, when he applied for a habeas corpus.

So on habeas corpus to obtain release when held under alleged excessive bail, under indictment for felonies, such as forgery, grand larceny, and embezzlement, the accused will be assumed guilty for the purpose of the proceeding. Ex parte Duncan, 53 Cal. 410, 54 Cal. 75.

And on application for bail by one indicted for murder, he will be presumed guilty of the highest degree of the crime, and must overcome that presumption by proof. Ex parte Vaughan, supra.

Under a constitutional provision allowing bail except in capital cases, where the proof is evident or the presumption great, an indictment for murder is sufficient to create this great presumption. Ex parte Smith, Hight v. United States, People v. Tinder, Ex parte Kendall, Ex parte Heffren, and Ex parte Jones, supra.

The same is true on indictment for rape, punishable with death. Ex parte Dusenberry, supra.

The general doctrine is fairly stated in the early case of Hight v. United States, supra, declaring that there is "no presumption of guilt against a prisoner when he is upon his trial, but so far as regards all intermediate proceedings between indictment and trial it furnishes the very strongest possible presumption of guilt."

The same doctrine is declared, although not in a habeas corpus case, in a decision excluding as a witness a codefendant of the accused. The court 23 L. R. A.

says "after a bill found, a defendant is presumed to be guilty to most if not to all purposes except that of a fair and impartial trial before a petit jury." State v. Mills, 13 N. C. 420.

The same doctrine in almost the same words is declared in proceedings for bail in People v. Tinder, 19 Cal. 539, 81 Am. Dec. 77; Ex parte Ryan, 44 Cal. 555.

So in State v. Herndon, 107 N. C. 934, it is said "while the indictment is no presumption of guilt on the trial before the petit jury, it is otherwise in the application for bail."

The generality of the expressions last quoted does not entirely agree with the statement in Re Peoples, 47 Mich. 626, that a person is not presumed to be guilty because he is under arrest, but that the presumption is the other way. But this language was not used in respect to a habeas corpus proceeding, or to any application of the prisoner for bail, but with respect to the protection of his rights against unnecessary delay for the mere convenience or personal accommodation of officers.

While the presumption of innocence does not exist for the purpose of a habeas corpus proceeding and the burden is on the applicant to overcome the prima facie case made by a commitment or indictment, the question after proof has been introduced is whether or not on the whole testimony there is reasonable doubt of guilt. Ex parte Bridewell, 57 Miss. 39.

It is said in Ex parte Hammock, 78 Ala. 414, that exculpatory evidence must be weighed "together with the presumption" raised by an indictment and the decision pronounced on the entire case as thus presented.

But on the other hand, in Ex parte Randon, 13 Tex. App. 145, it is said that when the evidence is gone into the question is to be determined without reference to whether or not the evidence was introduced by the applicant or by the state, and without reference to the prima facie case which would, in the absence of proof, be made by the production of a capias and a valid indictment.

These cases which are the only ones found which touch the point do not agree as to the right to consider the effect of an indictment as creating a presumption against the defendant, where evidence has been introduced by him to meet the prima facie case made by the indictment, but the cases all seem to agree that the whole evidence must satisfy the court that the proof of guilt is evident in order to justify a denial of bail, and perhaps the courts would not in practice be much affected by any difference in theory as to the effect of the presumption raised by the indictment after the question of innocence had been opened up on evidence.

were admitted to bail, or how, if injurious, this could be remedied by an appeal. It is res acta, and cannot be undone. Besides, the delay was to give the solicitor opportunity to examine into the case, and was expressly authorized by Code, § 1635*.

Upon the return of the sheriff, it appeared that the petitioners were in custody upon a mittimus (which, indeed, was also set out in the application for habeas corpus), regular in every way, from a justice of the peace, for failure to give bond for their appearance at the next term of the superior court to answer a criminal charge of which that court had jurisdiction. Nothing else appearing, the detention was clearly legal. The court thereupon called upon the petitioners to show wherein it was illegal. They declined to furnish him any evidence, but contended that the burden was upon the state to show that they were lawfully in custody. The state had already done so. It was not called upon to go further till testimony to the contrary was offered. The sheriff knew probably nothing whatever of the detention except the mittimus. He was not called upon to bring up the witnesses, to show what they testified to, or to prove that the petitioners were guilty of the charge. That fact will be inquired into by a grand jury, and afterwards by a petit jury, if a jury should be found, at the next term of the court. The presumption of innocence applies only upon such trial, and does not avail to furnish a presumption that the detention of a party upon regular process, when the committing officer has jurisdiction, is illegal, and to call upon the state in a proceeding like this to show that the defendant is guilty in order to justify the detention. The detention is to give opportunity for a jury to pass upon the question of the defendant's guilt. In State v. Herndon, 107 N. C. 934, the judge refused to hear any evidence, deeming the commitment (there, upon

*When it appears from the return to a writ of habeas corpus that the party named therein is detained on any criminal accusation, the court may, if he think proper, make no order for the discharge of such party until sufficient notice of the time and place at which the writ shall have been returned, or shall be made returnable, be given to the district solicitor of the county in which the person prosecuting the writ is detained.

a true bill found by a grand jury) conclusive of probable cause. The court held that the strong presumption was in favor of the correctness of the action of the grand jury, but that it was not conclusive, since there might be other evidence, not before them; hence that it was error to refuse to hear evidence, but that in no event, after indictment found, could the court discharge the prisoner. It might, in a proper case, admit to bail. But here the court did not refuse to hear evidence. It asked for it. The production of the mittimus was sufficient prima facie to show a legal detention. The petitioners had upon them the burden of showing evidence to rebut this, and the court made all the inquiry it was called upon to make (Code, § 1644) when it told them to proceed with their evidence, which they refused to do. If the petitioners had shown that there was no evidence at all before the justice, the judge could examine into the case de novo, unless they had waived the examination before the committing officer (9 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 197), and bind over or discharge them; or, if the facts proved did not constitute a crime, he might discharge them, or, if the bail was excessive in amount, reduce it. There may arise cases where the court, ex mero motu, as it has power to do, may issue the writ (Code, § 1632); and of course it may in all cases summon witnesses, and investigate whether the prima facie case of legal detention is not rebutted. But the present case does not raise a question of the power to do this. The petitioners are in court. There is nothing that indicates that they are weak, helpless, or ignorant of their rights. Indeed, they are represented by counsel. The judge does not refuse to hear testimony. He calls upon the state to show the cause of the detention. This it does satisfactorily by the sheriff's return. The court then asks the petitioners for their evidence. They refuse to give any. The court could do no otherwise than to refuse to discharge them. Code, § 1645. It seems, indeed, that the petitioners in fact are not even in custody, but are now out on bail. They have no ground to complain in any particular.

Petition dismissed.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

Hans JENSON, Resp't.,
v.

CHICAGO, ST. PAUL, MINNEAPOLIS,
& OMAHA R. CO., Appt.

1. The crossing of a highway and railroad at different elevations, one passing under the other, is not within the provisions of the statute as to the rate of speed of trains or as to ringing the bell or blowing the whistle at a highway crossing.

2. Failure to ring the bell or sound the whistle of a train on approaching a highway which passes under the railroad cannot be regarded as negligence which will make the railroad company liable for frightening a horse by the passing of the train, if the noise of the bell or whistle would under the circumstances have merely increased the noise of the train and tended to frighten the horse still more.

3. Compensatory damages cannot include an allowance for "inconvenience" as well as injuries.

NOTE.—In view of the wide-spread agitation to abolish railroad grade crossings and the already numerous overhead crossings the above decision is 22 L. R. A.

especially important as to the difference between these modes of crossing in respect to the necessary caution and signals.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for St. Croix County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Solon L. Perrin, for appellant:

If the view of a traveler on a highway approaching a railway crossing is so obstructed that he cannot see an approaching train in time to stop his team before injury, and if he is unable to hear an approaching train when his team is in motion, ordinary care requires him to stop and listen.

Seefeld v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 70 Wis. 216.

Plaintiff apprehended danger, or, as he himself says, was "wondering if I would get caught." It was at a place where he could not come in collision with the train; he was in possession of all his faculties, with nothing to distract his attention. He took all the chances attendant upon the undertaking.

Schmoles v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 88 Wis. 659; O'Donnell v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 7 Mo. App. 190.

The plaintiff testifies that he did not stop and listen for the train. Under all the authorities he was guilty of contributory negligence.

Butterfield v. Western R. Co. 10 Allen, 532, 87 Am. Dec. 678; Schofield v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 114 U. S. 615, 29 L. ed. 224; Favor v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 114 Mass. 350, 19 Am. Rep. 364; Rheiner v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 86 Minn. 170.

Messrs. Thomas Wilson and Humphrey & Arnuist also for appellant.

Mr. A. J. Kinney, for respondent:

The conditions surrounding this crossing make it an extremely dangerous one. Hence the law requires that the defendant's servants in charge of its trains, "should approach this crossing at a less rate of speed and use increased diligence in giving warning of their approach."

Continental Imp. Co. v. Stead, 95 U. S. 161, 24 L. ed. 403; Winstanley v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 72 Wis. 375; 1 Thomp. Neg. § 5, p. 422; Roberts v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 85 Wis. 679; Guggenheim v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 66 Mich. 150; Voak v. Northern Cent. R. Co. 75 N. Y. 320; Piper v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 77 Wis. 247.

Although the statute does not require a whistle to be blown for this crossing, yet the jury had a right to find, in view of the character of the crossing and the liability of an accident happening there, it was negligence on the part of the defendant to omit such a signal.

Cordell v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 70 N. Y. 119, 26 Am. Rep. 550; 1 Thomp. Neg. § 4, p. 419; Winstanley v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. supra; Eilert v. Green Bay & M. R. Co. 48 Wis. 606; Rorer, Railroads, 1012-1014.

The doctrine that the statute concerning the giving of signals does not require the whistle to be blown, except where the highway was crossed at grade, was considered and thoroughly exploded by the Kentucky court of appeals in Rupard v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 7 L. R. A. 316, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 1023.

See also Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Barnett, 59 22 L. R. A.

Pa. 259, 98 Am. Dec. 346; Wakefield v. Connecticut & P. R. R. Co. 87 Vt. 330, 86 Am. Dec. 711.

In Ransom v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co., 62 Wis. 178, 51 Am. Rep. 718, it is held that our statute "was intended to guard against the danger of injury from the frightening of teams driving upon the highway near the crossing as well as the danger of actual collision at the crossing."

See also 1 Thomp. Neg. § 15, p. 352.

There is no juridical distinction between an injury happening through the traveler's horse taking fright at the object, and an injury through his coming into direct collision with it.

1 Thomp. Neg. § 14, p. 349; Norton v. Eastern R. Co. 113 Mass. 366.

It was proper to submit to the jury the question whether, under the circumstances, the running of the train at the rate shown was negligence.

Winstanley v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 72 Wis. 375; Guggenheim v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 66 Mich. 150; 1 Thomp. Neg. § 3, p. 418; Linfield v. Old Colony R. Corp. 10 Cush. 562, 57 Am. Dec. 124; Richardson v. New York Cent. R. Co. 45 N. Y. 846.

Appellant insists that the plaintiff was negligent in not stopping his horse entirely and listening for the train; but there is nothing in the evidence that furnishes even a suggestion that he could have heard the train any better if he had stopped.

What is reasonable care in any case depends upon the particular circumstances of that case. Precautions which would be reasonable in one case may not be deemed so in another case. It is impossible for the law to define the acts which would or would not amount to reasonable care.

Dec. 761; Mackay v. New York Cent. R. Co. 35 N. Y. 75.

If for any reason the approach of a train cannot be perceived by passengers on this highway in the vicinity of this crossing, and the usual signals are not sufficient to give warning of its approach, then the defendant is bound to employ some other means of giving such warning.

Roberts v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 35 Wis. 679.

Orton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts of this case are substantially as follows: In the city of Hudson, and near the northeastern limits thereof, there is a highway or wagon road (the name of which is not given) that starts at the intersection of St. Croix and Eleventh streets, and runs in a northeasterly direction, in a descending grade, and through a deep cut, until it passes under the railroad, or railroad bridge over the same, of the defendant, and then passes on, and constitutes the main highway from the city to the North Wisconsin Junction. After it has passed under the railroad bridge, and about 72 feet from it, there had been a washout that tore out an old culvert, and made a gorge or gully about 20 feet deep in a part of the road, which left the track quite narrow. There was a fence along the edge of this gorge. On the 1st day of October, 1892, the plaintiff was traveling along this road from said junction towards the railroad bridge, with his wife, in a single carriage. When he was passing, or had just passed, under said bridge, a freight train of the defendant passed over said bridge, and the noise frightened the plaintiff's horse and he became unmanageable, and ran, and jumped over said fence into the said gorge, and, of course, turned over the carriage, and threw the plaintiff and his wife out, but, strange to say, with but slight injury to the plaintiff and no injury to his wife. It is difficult to say from the evidence whether the plaintiff was under the bridge when the train passed over it, or had passed beyond the bridge when the train passed over, for the plaintiff testified that he was going down the bank when he saw the engine, and that was over 70 feet from the bridge. It does not appear that this road was one of the streets of the city. It would appear to be a country highway, leading to the city, for it seems to have no name or number. The train was running about fifteen miles per hour. There was no proof that the bell was rung or the whistle blown before passing over the bridge. The learned judge instructed the jury that the statute required the bell to be rung at and before crossing, and that they should take into consideration the rate of speed that the train was running, and that it was negligence not to have rung the bell or blown the whistle. The jury must have found the defendant guilty of negligence in one or more of these particulars. The verdict for the plaintiff was $100. The court instructed the jury "that they could only allow the plaintiff a reasonable compensation for the inconvenience and injury he suffered from the causes named," and this was excepted to by the defendant's counsel. It is a little remarkable that this case was tried both by the court and counsel precisely as if the accident had occurred at an ordinary railway crossing at grade with and intersecting a highway. The very best reason for constructing a railroad over or under a highway is to avoid the danger and hazards of such an ordinary grade crossing. Our statute (§ 1837, Rev. Stat. and section 1299c, Sanborn & Berryman, Anno. Stat. p. 806) provides for constructing railways over bridges or arched culverts above highways. This bridge is presumed to have been constructed according to law. Such crossings are to be encouraged in order to secure the safety and security of the public, as crossings at grade are always dangerous. 19 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 868, 869; Pittsburg & C. R. Co. v. Southwest Penn. R. Co. 77 Pa. 173. All the statutory regulations and liabilities on the subject of railroad crossings apply only to such as are constructed at even grade with the highway, and none of them are applicable to a crossing constructed above or below the highway. 4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Common reason teaches that this crossing is very different from the common railroad crossing at the grade of the highway, not only in fact, but in all its incidents and relations to the traveling public. There is no danger at such a crossing of any collision of railroad trains or cars with man, beast, or vehicle on the highway. It cannot be the direct cause of any physical injury to any person or thing on the highway. The train passing over this bridge can cause no injury to persons or property on the highway other than, or different from, their injury while passing on a highway parallel to the railroad.

The only possible injury a railroad train can inflict upon persons or property in the highway is by frightening horses while drawing vehicles or being ridden, and causing them to run away, and do damage, as in this case. Only horses unused to such a place would be frightened, and only horses hard to hold, or not well subdued, would run away or get beyond the control of the driver; so that it is not common that any injury would happen, even from this cause. It is certainly no wrong for the train to be run over such bridges in the usual and ordinary way, and even in this way some horses going under the bridge, or being near it at the same time, might be frightened by it. The trains must necessarily make considerable noise going over the bridge. They cannot be run without it. It is not by any means certain that a train would make less noise going over slowly than faster. What degree of noise must it make to frighten horses? A horse liable to be frightened would be by the train passing over the bridge at any rate of speed. There are too many contingencies, conditions, and uncertainties about it to make it a rule of law that a high rate of speed would be the proximate cause of an injury caused by a horse running away through fright from the noise of the train. To be a rule of law, the injury from such a cause must not only be proximate, but usual or common, and to be expected, or that could be anticipated. There were probably a great many instances when horses passing under or near the bridge when a train was going over it were not caused to run away, or, if frightened at all by it, to such an extent. How could the company or its servants anticipate just when a horse would be frightened to such an extent, under such circumstances? This, so far as I know, is a new question, and I have said enough by the way of common reasoning, in the absence of authorities, to show that it would be an unsafe rule for the court to instruct the jury that they might consider the speed of the train, and find that its running at the rate of fifteen miles per hour was the proximate cause of the injury in this case. We have seen that the statute as to the rate of speed of the train and as to ringing the bell or blowing the whistle has no application to such a crossing. All such regulations apply only to crossings on an even grade with the highway, and the rules of law established by the decisions of the courts are with reference only to such crossings. The danger from such bridges of frightening horses is no greater in fact, and no more common, than from the railroad running near and parallel to a highway. It would seem to be no more reasonable to establish a rate of speed for the trains in passing such places in one case than in the other. This bridging over highways should be encouraged, not only for the safety of the public, but for the benefit of railroad companies themselves, and for their protection also. They should be no longer burdened, obstructed, or inconvenienced by the regulations and precautions applicable to grade crossings. If they are required to lessen their speed, to ring the bell and blow the whistle, and use all the precautions applicable to grade crossings, such expensive constructions in the interest of the public will be gratuitous, and they will not be encouraged to incur such an expense. As to ringing the bell and blowing the whistle, they are only required, if at all, in order to avoid frightening horses, and with that view to warn the traveler on the highway to stop. Where should he stop, and how near the bridge? If near the bridge, and his horse is liable to be frightened and run away, he will be in a much more dangerous condition than if he should drive on, and take his chances; for the horse, facing the train rushing over the bridge, would turn suddenly around to escape danger, and upset the carriage. If he is to stop at a place further off, to look or listen for the train, then such a precaution would be useless, for the train is then so far off as to be out of sight or hearing. The sound of the bell or the whistle is only heard when the train is near a grade crossing, and it may well warn the traveler to stop near the track of the crossing, and be out of danger. Take this case as an illustration. The plaintiff was driving in a deep cut with high embankments. If, when he entered it, he had looked or listened, he could not have seen or heard anything of the train, for it was too far off. If he had stopped nearer the bridge, he could not have seen the train or the trainmen seen him. He could only expect the bell to be rung or the whistle blown when he was very near the bridge. Then the noise of either would only have increased the noise of the train, and frightened the horse still more, and his only safe way would have been to drive on. The negligence of the company, to be culpable, must have caused or contributed to produce the injury. When was there any such negligence in this case? We cannot find from the evidence that there was any.

The jury followed the instructions of the court, and ignored the fact that this was not a grade crossing to which the statutory regulations applied, and found negligence only appropriate to such a crossing. It was clearly a mistrial, by the trial of issues not in the case. A railroad bridge crossing was made to bear all the legal tests of a grade crossing that intersects the highway. I am unable to suggest what regulations, if any, ought to be provided for such a crossing by the legislature. It is so much like a highway near and parallel to the railroad, on which horses may be frightened by the noise and seeing the train pass by, that I am unable to suggest any regulations which ought not to apply to one as well as the other. This plaintiff knew when he entered the deep cut leading to the bridge that he had a horse liable to be frightened and run away if he should be caught near or under the bridge when the train passed over it, and yet he drove on, thinking, as he said, that he might be there when the train passed. He knew when he entered the deep cut that the train was then too far away to be seen or heard, for he says he looked for a train, and did not hear or see any; and yet he drove on, more and more out of sight of an approaching train and when he could have heard the bell or whistle it was too late. His horse had jumped over the fence when he first saw the locomotive. He did not wait or stop to look or listen, but took his chances, and drove on. I am not sure but that the company might make itself liable for blowing the whistle and ringing the bell so near such a bridge crossing as to frighten teams passing under it on the highway. But that is not this case.

It is not very important to notice one erroneous word in the instructions of the court, where the whole general charge was so clearly erroneous. The court instructed the jury that they might allow a reasonable compensation to the plaintiff for the inconvenience as well as for the injury he suffered. The court might as well have told the jury to make the plaintiff's verdict large enough to compensate him for any disquiet, uneasiness, annoyance, or trouble he suffered, for these are inconveniences according to Webster; and they are not the subjects of compensation, although they might be of exemplary damages. The misuse of this word may have swelled the damages for this trifling injury to $100. It was, therefore, an error.

This case is not important in amount, but it certainly is important in the legal principles involved. Cases like this are not common, and it is at least doubtful whether there ought to be any like it.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

MONTANA SUPREME COURT.

MONTANA CATHOLIC MISSION, S. J., Appt.,
v.
 LEWIS AND CLARKE COUNTY et al.,
Resp'ts.

(.....Mont.....)

1. Property owned by a charitable institution is not exempt from taxation if not used by the institution. Under Const., art. 12, § 2, exempting property "used exclusively for" certain specified purposes including "institutions of public charity."
2. The intention to use property by a charitable institution is not equivalent to the use of it within a provision as to exemption from taxation.

(December 20, 1898.)

A PPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the District Court for Lewis and Clarke County in favor of defendants in a suit brought to enjoin the collection of certain taxes which had been assessed against property held by plaintiffs. Affirmed.

Statement by DeWitt, J.:

This action was brought by the plaintiff against the county of Lewis and Clarke and the treasurer thereof praying for a judgment that the assessment of general taxes against certain real estate of plaintiff, and the levy of said taxes, be adjudged to be void, and that the said treasurer be enjoined from selling said property for said taxes. The plaintiff set up in its complaint that it was an institution of purely public charity, and that it was the owner of certain lands in Lewis and Clarke county, describing them. It is not set up in the complaint that this land is now being used by the plaintiff in any manner. It is alleged in the complaint that the lands are held for the purpose of erecting buildings for certain purely charitable purposes, unsectarian in character. Upon these lands, the general taxes were assessed and levied by the county of Lewis and Clarke for the year 1892. The plaintiff claimed, before the board of equalization, that it was exempt from this taxation, but the board refused to allow said claim, except as to twenty acres of the tract above described, upon which is being built an asylum for orphans. A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and judgment thereon entered for defendants. The plaintiff appealed.

The appeal brings up for a construction the following provisions of the constitution and laws: "The property of the United States, the state, counties, cities, towns, school districts, municipal corporations, and public libraries, shall be exempt from taxation, and such other property as may be used exclusively for agricultural and horticultural societies, for educational purposes, places for actual religious worship, hospitals and places of burial, not used or held for private or corporate profit, and institutions of purely public charity, may be exempt from taxation." Const. § 2, art. 12. In pursuance to this provision of the constitution, the legislature enacted as follows: "The property of the United States, the state, counties, cities, towns, school districts, municipal corporations, public libraries, and such other property as is used exclusively for agricultural and horticultural societies, for educational purposes, places for actual religious worship, hospitals and places of burial not used or held for private or corporate profit, and institutions of purely public charity, are exempt from taxation; provided, no more land than is necessary for said purposes shall be exempt." Section 2 of "An Act Concerning Revenue" (p. 73, 2d Sess. 1891).

Mr. T. J. Walsh, for appellant:

The word "institution" in the statute and in the constitution is used in its largest and most comprehensive sense to signify, as expressed by Webster, "an established or organized society or corporation . . . as a literary institution, a charitable institution," as well as in the sense of "a building or the buildings used by such organization, as the Smithsonian Institution."

The latter seems to be a derivative sense of recent origin.

Nobles County v. Hamline University, 46 Minn. 316.

Any "reasonable doubt must be solved in favor of the legislative action and the act be sustained."

Cooley, Const. Lim. 182; Sedgw. Stat. & Const. L. 409; Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, 526.

This expression, "institutions of purely public charity," is found in similar provisions of the constitutions of Ohio and Pennsylvania, and in both of these states has been construed to refer to the corporation or association and not alone to the building occupied by such.

Gerke v. Purcell, 25 Ohio St. 229; Donohugh's App. 86 Pa. 306.

The use of the word in the sense contended for by the plaintiff in similar statutes is common and much more frequent than in the restricted sense.

McLain's Stat. 1277; San Francisco Ladies Prot. & Relief Soc. v. Story, 82 Cal. 65; Pub. Stat. chap. 2, § 5, cl. 3; Massachusetts Soc. for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals v. Boston, 142 Mass. 24; Starr & C. Anno. Stat. p. 2027; Morris v. Lone Star Chapter No. 6, Royal Arch Masons, 68 Tex. 698.

If the institution is devoted to charity by the very fundamental law of its existence and is free from the elements of private or corporate profit it is an institution of purely public charity and the fact that tuition fees may be required to make up part of the expense of maintaining the college or school does not deprive it of that character.

The fear which might be entertained in some quarters of the accumulation of the plaintiff and other similar societies of inordinate amounts of property by reason of its immunity from taxation is shown by the court in Washington University v. Rouse, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 439, 19 L. ed. 498, to be without much foundation, since such a course would be at the risk of the forfeiture of their corporate franchises.

Messrs. Henri J. Haskell, Atty. Gen., and C. B. Noland, for respondent:

It is the use, and not the ownership, that would entitle the property to exemption. The intention to exempt property from taxation must be expressed in clear, unambiguous terms; taxation is the rule and exemption is the exception.

Cooley, Taxn. p. 146, and authorities cited in note 1; Desty, Taxation, pp. 110, 118.

Courts invariably hold that some actual appropriation of the land for the purposes intended must be shown in order to exempt it from taxation, and the intent to so appropriate it at some indefinite time in the future is not sufficient.

DeWitt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The contention of appellant is that section 2, art. 12, of the Constitution, and section 2 of the Revenue Act of 1891, exempt from taxation the real estate described in its complaint. It is fully conceded by the complaint that the real estate is not used by the plaintiff exclusively, or at all, for an institution of purely public charity. It is alleged that it is intended to be so used. For the purposes of this decision, it may be considered that the plaintiff is an institution of purely public charity. It is observed that the section of the constitution cited describes two classes of property. We will notice the distinction as to these two classes: First, it names the United States, the state, counties, cities, towns, school districts, municipal corporations, and public libraries. It is not left to the legislature to say whether or not the property of these institutions shall be exempt. The constitution, in itself, settles that it shall be. Nor is the test of exclusive use mentioned. The constitution says, simply, "the property" of these institutions shall be exempt. Then the section of the constitution advances to another class of property, and describes it as "property as may be used exclusively for" certain purposes, and defines the purposes, and, among them, names "institutions of purely public charity." This class of property is not exempt from taxation under the constitution, but may be made so by the legislature. The legislature has acted. Revenue Act 1891, § 2. It has therein declared to be exempt, such property as is used exclusively for the purposes mentioned in the section of the constitution, supra; and re-describes those purposes in the exact language of the constitution, making only the appropriate changes in the mood of the verbs. So, with the constitution and the law together, we have this condition: Property of certain entities, as the state, cities, etc., is exempt, and property exclusively used for certain purposes is exempt. The property in question falls within the second class, as the plaintiff is not one of the institutions mentioned in the first class, as the state or a city, etc., but is an "institution of purely public charity." And we find from the complaint that the property is not used exclusively, or at all, by such "institution of purely public charity." The most that the complaint alleges is that the property is intended to be so used. Such intention is not sufficient to constitute the use contemplated by the constitution and the law. Green Bay & M. Canal Co. v. Outagamie County, 76 Wis. 587.

In Pennsylvania, the court went further than we do, or need to, and held that the exemption would not apply to premises on which a church was in process of erection. Mullen v. Erie County Comrs., 85 Pa. 288, 27 Am. Rep. 650. How much stronger against the appellant is the fact that in this case there is not even a commencement of the alleged intended use. See also Detroit Young Men's Soc. v. Detroit, 3 Mich. 172; Mulroy v. Churchman, 60 Iowa, 717; Boston Soc. of Redemptorist Fathers v. Boston, 129 Mass. 178; Washburn College v. Shawnee County Comrs. 8 Kan. 344. We are therefore clearly of opinion that, as the property in question is not at all used for an "institution of purely public charity," it is not exempt from taxation.

This must be held unless a construction of the constitution and the law which appellant urges, and which we will now examine, is to be adopted. It contends that the language does not mean that the property used by such institution shall be exempt, but rather that the institution, as such an association or corporation, shall be exempt from paying taxes on its property. The conclusion would be that such institution is exempt from paying taxes upon any of its property. Appellant contends that the word "institution," used in the statute, means the association, the corporation, or the concern, whatever it may be. Concede that such is the meaning, still we are of opinion that the section is describing property that is or may be exempt, and not the institution which is the owner of property. The whole sense of the section is that it describes property,—the property of the United States; the property of the state, of cities, etc.; property used exclusively for—For what? For the following purposes (then setting forth the purposes). The word "for"

is not repeated before each described purpose, nor does grammatical construction or perspicuity require it. Its sense is carried over to each mentioned purpose. The intention is just as clear that the section means "used exclusively for institutions of purely public charity," as it is that it means "used exclusively for agricultural societies." We adhere to the view that the language intends to describe the property used, and not the concern using it, as being exempt. This view is in accord with the grammatical construction of the language, with the context of the section, and the general intent expressed therein. To adopt appellant's construction would be to hold, if an institution were simply of the character described in the constitution and law, that, as far as the revenue laws are concerned, it might hold exempt from taxation all property of any character, and of any amount in value, whether it used such property exclusively, or at all, for purely public charity. Against this view are the decided cases (supra), reason, the context of section 2, art. 12, and the spirit of the constitution on the subject of taxation. That instrument provides: "All property shall be assessed in the manner prescribed by law except as otherwise provided in this constitution." Article 12, § 16. So, appellant seeks to bring itself within an exception to the constitutional rule that "all property shall be assessed." Upon this subject, Mr. Justice Brewer, as a member of the supreme court of Kansas, appropriately remarked: "All property receives protection from the state. Every man is secured in the enjoyment of his own, no matter to what use he devotes it. This security and protection carry with them the corresponding obligation to support. It is an obligation which rests equally upon all. It may require military service in time of war, or civil service in time of peace. It always requires pecuniary support. This is taxation. The obligation to pay taxes is coextensive with the protection received. An exemption from taxation is a release from this obligation. It is the receiving of protection without contributing to the support of the authority which protects. It is an exception to a rule, and is justified and upheld upon the theory of peculiar benefits received by the state from the property exempted. Nevertheless, it is an exception; and they who claim under an exception must show themselves within its terms." Washburn College v. Shawnee County Comrs. 8 Kan. 344.

Appellant herein seeks to bring itself within the exception by a strained and unnatural construction of the constitution, as above shown. The district court held against it, in which that court was correct.

Its judgment is therefore affirmed.

Pemberton, Ch. J., concurs.

Harwood, J., concurring:

I concur in the foregoing conclusion, on the ground that the legislature, in exercising the power delegated to it by the constitution, of providing, among other things, exemption from taxation of property "used exclusively" for "institutions of purely public charity," has especially provided, as to exemption of land, that "no more land than is necessary for said purpose shall be exempt." The contention involved in this case relates entirely to the question of exempting land, and it seems clear to me, under the provisions of the law, that land, although held by such institutions, but not in use for the purposes of such charity, cannot claim exemption from taxation. It will be noticed that the legislature made the clause above quoted relate specifically to land, and the observations in the treatment of this case must be confined to the question of exemption of that character of property; and broader implications, as governing the construction of the provisions respecting other classes of property, should not be indulged to determine future cases, involving the question of exemption of other classes of property held by such institutions, dedicated irrevocably to the use upon which the exemption is declared, although not actually converted into active use at the moment it was sought to be taxed.

EXCHANGE NATIONAL BANK OF

v.

BANK OF LITTLE ROCK.

(68 Fed. Rep. 140.)

1. A drawer of a draft or note complete in itself but in such form as to be easily altered without attracting attention is not liable for the amount to which it is afterwards fraudulently raised by a third person without his knowledge or authority, even to an innocent purchaser, since it is not his negligence but the crime of the forger that is the proximate cause of the loss.

2. A bank which issues to a confidential clerk and employs a draft upon another bank upon such clerk's repre-

NOTE.—Liability of maker or drawer on raised negotiable paper.

There is some conflict of authority as to the liability of obligors on commercial paper in the hands of bona fide holders for value where such paper was altered after delivery by increasing the amount—some cases holding with the main case that such material alteration renders the paper void even if it was issued in such a form as to be easily altered without exciting suspicion. Burrows v. Klunk, 322 L. R. A.

L. R. A. 576, 70 Md. 451; Greenfield Sav. Bank v. Stowell, 123 Mass. 193, 25 Am. Rep. 67; Knoxville Nat. Bank v. Clark, 61 Iowa, 264, 33 Am. Rep. 122; Flannagan v. National Bank of Dover, N. J. 13 N. Y. S. R. 826; Wade v. Withington, 1 Allen, 561.

In these cases the doctrine announced in Young v. Grote, infra, has been denied, criticised, or held to be inapplicable.

Other cases hold that the obligor on commercial paper is released where the same has been altered sentation that he desires it for the purpose of making a remittance is not liable to a bona fide holder of such draft who takes it after it has been raised by such clerk to a larger amount for the increased amount, since such clerk does not in raising it act for the bank or in his capacity as clerk.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount of a New York draft drawn by defendant and raised by a third person after it had been issued. Affirmed.

Statement by Sanborn, Circuit Judge:

The Exchange National Bank of Spokane, Wash., plaintiff in error, brings this writ of error to reverse a judgment of dismissal of an action brought by it against the Bank of Little Rock, Ark., the defendant in error, to recover the amount of a draft for $2,500 which had been raised from $25 after the defendant issued it, and before the plaintiff bought it. One D. C. Jordan, an employé of the defendant, whose business it was to prepare the exchange for the cashier to sign, drew a draft of the defendant on a New York bank, payable to his own order, for $25, for the cashier to sign, under the pretense that he wished to make a remittance to his brother. He so wrote the words "twenty-five" that there was room in the blank just after it to insert the word "hundred." He so punched the figures "$25" that there was room just after them to insert with the punch two ciphers and a star in the usual manner, and he so wrote the figures "$25" that there was room immediately after them to insert two ciphers. In this condition he presented the draft to the cashier, who examined it, saw the way in which it was written and punched, and then signed it, and delivered it to Jordan. The latter then made the insertions of the words and figures he had left room for, and the paper became a fair draft for $2,500, without any erasure, interlineation, or other mark to excite suspicion of the alteration. This is a copy of the altered draft:

After making the alterations, he indorsed this draft to a fictitious person, indorsed the by increasing the amount to be paid, after such paper has been delivered, and the question of negligence in issuing the paper so that it could be easily altered is not discussed. Ruby v. Talbott (N. M.) 3 L. R. A. 724; Goodman v. Eastman, 4 N. H. 456; Evans v. Deming, 20 N. Y. Week. Dig. 71; Mills v. Starr, 2 Bail. L. 359.

And in Burwell v. Orr, 84 Ill. 465, it was held that where a note was raised it will be presumed to have been altered by payee and it could not be collected by a subsequent bona fide indorsee, and that the whole was void; but no cases were cited, and the question of negligence was not discussed. See Yocum v. Smith, infra.

And the same was held in Fordyce v. Kosminski, 49 Ark. 40, on the ground that the alteration was not made by one standing in confidential relation.

And an accommodation indorser not consenting is released where the drawer of a bill raised the amount by the consent of the holder. Bachelder v. White, 80 Va. 108.

And where the amount of a check was expunged and skillfully raised after it was issued, the depositor was only liable to the bank paying the same to the amount originally inserted. Hall v. Fuller, 5 Barn. & C. 750, 8 Dowl. & R. 464.

And Trapp v. Spearman, 3 Esp. 37, holds that the alteration of a note by raising the amount renders it void as against the maker, but this was not the question involved in the case.

But the case of Young v. Grote, 4 Bing. 253, 12 Moore, 454, holds that the drawer of a check who signed the same in blank and left it with his wife is liable thereon, where his clerk fraudulently altered the same by raising the amount after he had filled it out as directed by the wife. This was the leading case on alteration of instruments, but it has been questioned and its authority denied in Baxendale v. Bennett, L. R. 3, Q. B. Div. 525, 47 L. J. C. P. 624, 28 Week. Rep. 899, 19 Alb. L. J. 372, which was a case where a signed blank bill of exchange was negligently left in a drawer and stolen, and the drawer's name filled in.

of a check, which was negligently issued so as to be easily raised, will lose where it is paid by the bank. Halifax Union v. Wheelwright, 44 L. J. Exch. 121, L. R. 10 Exch. 153, 32 L. T. N. S. 802, 28 Week. Rep. 704.

So trustees under a 'paving act, who negligently sign checks so that they can be easily raised, cannot hold the clerk who drafted them liable. Whitmore v. Wilks, 2 Car. & P. 364.

Worrall v. Gheen, 39 Pa. 383, and Garrard v. Hadden, 67 Pa. 32, 5 Am. Rep. 412, while doubting Young v. Grote, supra, held that the obligor was only liable to the original amount as shown by the paper when executed.

So the maker of a note will be liable to a bona fide holder where he issued it so that it was easily altered and raised in amount, and delayed after knowledge of the alteration to inform the holder, who was prejudiced thereby. Yocum v. Smith, 63 Ill. 321, 14 Am. Rep. 120. See Burwell v. Orr, supra.

The Louisiana cases follow the civil law and hold that the obligor is still liable where he was negligent in issuing commercial papers so that the amount was raised without exciting suspicion. Inard v. Torres, 10 La. Ann. 108; Helwege v. Hibernia Nat. Bank, 23 La. Ann. 520.

And the same was held where one joint maker raised a note without the knowledge of the other makers after all had signed it. Scottland County Nat. Bank v. O'Connell, 23 Mo. App. 165.

This case holds that an alteration by raising the amount avoids a note, but under the facts in this case a delivery by one maker of negotiable paper to another maker to issue the same, in a condition to allow it to be easily raised renders the obligors liable.

A drawer has no cause of action against a party who has bona fide received from his drawee and paid out the proceeds of a raised draft. The remedy is between the drawer and drawee, and between the drawee and the bona fide purchaser. National Bank of Commerce v. Manufacturers & T. Bank, 123 N. Y. 367, 15 N. Y. S. R. 630. L. T.

name of the fictitious person upon it, and delivered it to a third person, who was identified at the bank of the plaintiff, and at whose request the plaintiff discounted the draft in good faith, for value, and without notice or suspicion of any alteration in it. The court below held that the draft was a forgery, and imposed no liability on the defendant, and this is the supposed error complained of.

Before Sanborn, Circuit Judge, and Thayer, District Judge.

Messrs. S. R. Cockrill and George H. Sanders, for plaintiff in error:

The maker or drawer of a raised bill or note is liable to a bona fide holder without notice, for the raised amount, where the maker or drawer has drawn the instrument in such a form as to afford the holder the opportunity to insert in spaces negligently left in the instrument, additional words and figures raising the amount in such manner as to prevent detection.

Rep. 412; Leas v. Walls, 101 Pa. 57, 47 Am. Rep. 699; Blakey v. Johnson, 18 Bush, 197, 26 Am. Rep. 254; Iron Mountain Bank of St. Louis v. Murdock, 62 Mo. 70; Capital Bank v. Smith, 55 Ill. 224; Helwege v. Hibernia Nat. Bank, 28 La. Ann. 520; Kulb v. United States, 18 Ct. Cl. 560; Coles v. Bank of England, 10 Ad. & El. 184; Ingram v. Primrose, 7 C. B. N. S. 82; Young v. Grote, 4 Bing. 253.

In Crawford v. West Side Bank, 100 N. Y. 50, 58 Am. Rep. 152, the reasonable rule to govern such cases is stated with its proper qualifications as follows: "The theory that a party who makes and issues commercial paper, properly and carefully drawn, to express the liability which he intends to assume, is chargeable with negligence on account of the criminal act of another in altering it after its issue, would render him a warrantor against such acts and is repugnant to justice and reason." The qualification is, that in order to entitle the maker to the protection indicated, the paper must be properly and carefully drawn.

When the maker put the note in circulation, it was an invitation to the public to purchase it from the holder, with apparent title. The alteration could not be detected, and the maker is estopped from urging his defense.

Yocum v. Smith, 68 Ill. 321, 14 Am. Rep. 120.

The principle which lies at the foundation of these actions I think, is, that the maker, who, by putting his paper in circulation, has invited the public to receive it of any one having it in possession with apparent title is estopped to urge the actual defect of title against a bona fide holder.

Van Duser v. Howe, 21 N. Y. 531.

Justice as well as the public policy, which lies at the foundation of the laws as to commercial paper, requires that the loss shall fall upon the maker rather than on the innocent holder.

Redlich v. Doll, 54 N. Y. 236, 13 Am. Rep. 578.

In Zimmerman v. Rote, 75 Pa. 188, the court says: "It is the duty of the maker of a note to guard not only himself but the public against frauds and alterations, by refusing to sign negotiable paper made in such a form as to admit of fraudulent practices upon them with ease and without ready detection."

See also Halifax Union v. Wheelwright, L. R. 10 Exch. 192; Espy v. First Nat. Bank of Cincinnati, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 604, 21 L. ed. 947.

The fact that the alteration amounts to a felony is not material.

Redlich v. Doll, supra.

Jordan, who raised the draft in this case, was the clerk of the drawer.

None of the cases avoids the altered paper in the hands of a bona fide holder where such an alteration as we have in this case was made by the maker's clerk. Their harsh doctrine stops at the line "where the alteration is made by an agent, clerk, or confidential party."

Garrard v. Hadden, supra; McSparren v. Neeley, 91 Pa. 26; Halifax Union v. Wheelwright, supra.

The paper being fair on its face, the burden of proof was on the defendant, to show affirmatively that the alteration was made after its execution and delivery.

Messrs. Dan W. Jones and W. S. McCain, for defendant in error:

If promissory notes were only given by first-class business men who are skillful in drawing them up in the best possible manner to prevent forgery, it might be well to adopt the high standard of accuracy and perfection which the argument in behalf of the plaintiff in error would require. But for the great mass of the people such a standard would be altogether too high, and would tend to encourage forgery by the protection it would give to forged paper.

Holmes v. Trumper, 23 Mich. 427, 7 Am. Rep. 661.

The courts have accepted and adopted the simple and sensible rule of caveat emptor. No man must purchase a piece of negotiable paper unless he knows that the holder is the lawful owner, or unless it is payable or indorsed to bearer.

Clark*, 51 Iowa, 264, 33 Am. Rep. 129; Holmes v. Trumper, supra; Bruce v. Westcott, 3 Barb. 374; Goodman v. Eastman, 4 N. H. 455; Cronkhite v. Nebeker, 81 Ind. 319, 42 Am. A. 576, 70 Md. 451; Bigelow, Leading Cases on Notes & Bills, note 3, p. 573.

In Angle v. Northwestern L. Ins. Co., 92 U. S. 340, 23 L. ed. 559, the court says: "Where blanks exist in negotiable securities, delivered to another for use, the custody of the paper, under such circumstances, gives the custodian the right to fill the blanks; but it does not confer authority to make any addition to the terms of the note; and if any such of a material character, are made by such a party from whom the paper was received, it will avoid the note, even in the hands of an innocent holder."

Espy v. First Nat. Bank of Cincinnati, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 604, 21 L. ed. 947.

When an agent undertakes to make a deal in his own name and on his own account with his principal, that moment, and for that transaction, he ceases to be an agent and becomes a mere stranger.

It makes no difference that the forgery was committed by a confidential clerk of the depositor, who by his position had unusual facilities for perpetrating the fraud and imposing the forged paper upon the bank.

Frank v. Chemical Nat. Bank, 84 N. Y. 218, 38 Am. Rep. 501; Belknap v. National Bank of North America, 100 Mass. 876, 97 Am. Dec. 105; Shipman v. Bank of State of New York, 12 L. R. A. 791, 126 N. Y. 318; Bank of Ireland v. Evans Charities, 5 H. L. 389; Young v. Grote, 4 Bing. 253.

The check was made payable to Jordan, who indorsed it to one Frank H. Lathrop, a fictitious person, and the indorsement of Lathrop, through which plaintiff claims, was forged. If this forged indorsement be struck out, plaintiff has no title. There is no difference between the forgery of a fictitious person's name and that of a real person.

State v. Gibbs, 5 Ala. 759; Shipman v. Bank of State of New York, supra; Armstrong v. Pomeroy Nat. Bank, 6 L. R. A. 625, 46 Ohio St. 512.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

There is a decided conflict of authorities over the question whether the maker of commercial paper or the innocent purchaser of it should bear the loss resulting from a fraudulent and unauthorized alteration in its terms or amount after its issuance and before its purchase, where the drawer or maker writes it so carelessly that the alteration may be made without exciting any suspicion of the forgery.

It is said that the drawer should suffer the loss, because his carelessness invites the forgery, on the principle that where one of two innocent parties must suffer from the fault of a third he shall sustain the loss who put it in the power of a third to occasion it. It is said that he should bear the loss, because when he issues the paper he represents to the commercial world that the draft or note is genuine, and because confidence in negotiable paper will be lessened if makers are allowed to repudiate alterations which they have invited. These are but some of the reasons assigned for charging the maker of the paper with the loss. They are good reasons for holding the maker of negotiable paper liable for any loss of which his carelessness is the proximate cause. If he carelessly intrusts checks or notes having blanks therein that were evidently intended to be filled, to a third party, who subsequently fills up and sells them, or if he intrusts to a confidential clerk the duty of filling the blanks in notes or drafts he has assigned or indorsed, and the clerk inserts excessive amounts, he cannot defend against such paper in the hands of an innocent purchaser, and the reasons referred to above fairly apply. In such cases the loss is the natural and probable consequence of his own negligence, a loss that he might have and ought to have foreseen, a loss the risk of which he fairly assumes by his own acts. But when the drawer has issued a draft or note complete in itself, but in such a form as to be easily altered without attracting attention, and it is afterwards fraudulently raised by a third person, without his knowledge or authority, and then bought by an innocent purchaser, it is not his negligence, but the crime of the forger, that is the proximate cause of the loss. Forgery and consequent loss cannot be said to be the natural or probable consequence of issuing a draft inartificially drawn. The presumption is that dealers in commercial paper are honest men, and not forgers, and that such paper will not be changed. It will not do to say that every one whose negligence invites another to commit a crime is liable to a third party for the loss the latter sustains thereby. One who, by carelessly leaving a pile of shavings near his house, invites another to commit the crime of arson that results in the burning of his neighbor's buildings, is not liable to his neighbor for that loss. The farmer who negligently turns his horse into the highway, and thereby invites a thief to steal it, does not thereby lose title to his horse when an innocent purchaser has bought him of the thief. Nor is there, in our opinion, any sound reason why the liability of the maker of a promissory note or bill of exchange, complete in itself when issued, but subsequently fraudulently raised without his knowledge or authority, should be measured by the facility with which a third person has committed the crime of forgery upon it, or why he should be held liable for the loss resulting from such a forgery. The altered contract is not his contract. His representation was not that the forged contract was his, but that the original contract was his, and the rule caveat emptor makes it the duty of the purchaser when he buys it, and not of the maker, to then see that it is genuine. To cite and attempt to distinguish the decisions upon this question would be a work of supererogation. The authorities have all been carefully reviewed, and the conclusion to which we have arrived has been reached in Holmes v. Trumper, 22 Mich. 427, 7 Am. Rep. 661, by Mr. Justice Christianity, with whom Chief Justice Campbell and Justices Graves and Cooley concurred; in Greenfield Sav. Bank v. Stowell, 123 Mass. 196, 25 Am. Rep. 67, by Chief Justice Gray, without dissent from any member of the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts; in Burrows v. Klunk, 70 Md. 451, 3 L. R. A. 576, in Knoxville Nat. Bank v. Clark, 51 Iowa, 264, 33 Am. Rep. 129; in Forde v. Kosminski, 49 Ark. 40; and in Goodman

v. Eastman, 4 N. H. 455; while the decisions in Simmons v. Atkinson & Lampton Co. 69 Miss. 862; Charlton v. Reed, 61 Iowa, 166, 47 Am. Rep. 808, and Angle v. Northwestern L. Ins. Co. 92 U. S. 380, 340, 23 L. ed. 556, 559—are to the same effect. This question has been much discussed, and the authorities differ, but we think the better reasons, the most forcible and convincing opinions, and the marked trend of the later decisions support the view of the court below.

But it is said that this case is an exception to the decisions and the reasoning to which we have referred because this draft was raised by the confidential clerk and employé of the bank. The answer is that this was a transaction between the bank on one side and Jordan, the clerk, as a purchaser of the draft, on the other. Whatever may have been their relations in other matters, in this they dealt at arm's length as vendor and purchaser. Moreover, it was not until after the draft had become a perfect instrument, had been signed by the cashier, and completely delivered to the purchaser, that it was raised. Certainly Jordan was not then acting for the bank, or in his capacity as its clerk. The bank did not employ or confide in him to remit or dispose of this draft after he had purchased it. He was then acting in his own behalf, and using his own property.

The judgment below is affirmed, with costs.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

BALTIMORE BASE BALL & EXHIBITION CO. of Baltimore City, Appt.,

v.

John T. PICKETT.

(.....Md.....)

- 1. The ordinary skill, knowledge, and efficiency of base ball players is all that is required of a player under a contract of hiring for a definite time, which is silent as to the degree of skill to be possessed.
- 2. A usage to affect a contract must be so general and well established that knowledge and adoption of it may be presumed; and it must be certain and uniform.
- 3. A usage or custom for base-ball clubs to discharge a player on ten days' notice, if he is deficient in playing, cannot modify a special contract for a definite time,—especially when the player has no reciprocal right to cancel the contract.
- 4. The amount to be recovered for unlawful discharge of an employee is the contract price less what may have been paid him, and also what he has earned or by due diligence might have earned during the time covered by the contract.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court of Baltimore City in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for alleged breach of contract to pay plaintiff for playing ball for defendant during the season of 1892. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Rich & Bryan, for appellants:

That the usage and custom was proved by one witness only has been held by the highest authority to be no objection to its admissibility.

Robinson v. United States, 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 363, 20 L. ed. 653.

Where the usage of a particular trade or business is well established, it is as obligatory on the objects of its operation as a general law.

Patterson v. Crowther, 70 Md. 124.

The object of proving a general custom is not to contradict or change the contract made between the parties, but to interpret it to the court and jury as it was understood by the parties at the time it was made.

Hewitt v. John Week Lumber Co. 77 Wis. 556.

In Metzner v. Bolton, 9 Exch. 518, a salesman was employed for a year, and there was a usage of the trade to dismiss on three months' notice. The usage was held to modify the contract.

See also Given v. Charron, 15 Md. 502; Lyon v. George, 44 Md. 300; Patterson v. Crowther, supra; Williams v. Woods, 16 Md. 255; Williams v. Gilman, 3 Me. 276; Smith v. Wilson, 3 Barn. & Ad. 728; Hewitt v. John Week Lumber Co. supra.

As the custom was general, had been in existence as long as there had been such a thing as professional base-ball, and was observed by all professional base-ball clubs, it was not necessary to prove that the plaintiff had any knowledge of it. That knowledge will, if the jury find the custom to have been of such general and universal prevalence, be presumed in law.

Lyon v. George, 44 Md. 301; Bank of Columbia v. Fitzhugh, 1 Harr. & G. 248.

If it were necessary for the jury to find actual knowledge of this custom on the part of the plaintiff, they could infer such knowledge from the fact that he himself testified that he had been a professional base-ball player for eight or nine years, and had, among other clubs, played in the Philadelphia League Club in 1890.

Whenever any one accepts employment which requires the exercise of special skill or knowledge, he impliedly holds himself out as possessing and as agreeing to use that degree of skill which the employment demands.

On petition for reargument.

While it is clear that no custom can be proved which contradicts the express terms of a written contract, it is equally clear that evidence may be introduced "to add incidents" to a written contract, and to explain its meaning.

Humfrey v. Dale, 7 El. & Bl. 274.

To fall within the exception of repugnancy, the incident must be such as, if expressed in the written contract, would make it insensible or inconsistent.

Patterson v. Crouther, 70 Md. 180.

A custom, not only like the one at bar, to discharge for cause (i. e., not being, in the opinion of the club's manager, efficient, where if the manager did not in good faith exercise that judgment the discharge would be wrongful, Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Brydon, 65 Md. 198, 67 Am. Rep. 318), but even to discharge at will, would be admissible where the contract is for a year or other fixed period.

Mr. John M. Gallagher for appellee.

Briscoe, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought for the alleged breach of a special contract of hiring. The contract was made and entered into by and between the Baltimore base ball club of the city of Baltimore, party of the first part and John T. Pickett of the city of Chicago party of the second part, and is in these words: That "the said party of the second part agrees to play ball for the party of the first part for the season of 1892, for the sum of three thousand ($3,000) dollars, with five hundred dollars advanced on the contract; said sum of five hundred dollars ($500), to be considered part of the said three thousand ($3,000) dollars above stated. Salary payable first and fifteenth of each month; services to commence on the 26th of March, 1892, and end on October 31, 1892."

The appellee, the plaintiff below, entered upon the services and performed them until the 1st day of June, 1892, when he was discharged or released. He was paid five hundred dollars ($500) advance money and also four payments on account of his salary. The grounds set up for his discharge were want of skill and ability. The judgment was for the plaintiff and the defendant has appealed.

At the trial there were ten exceptions reserved to the rejection by the court of evidence offered by the defendant, the third, ninth and tenth of which were abandoned at the hearing. There were also exceptions to the granting of the first, fourth, and fifth prayers of the plaintiff and to the rejection of the first, third, sixth, and eighth prayers of the defendant, and to the instruction on the part of the court. These exceptions form the basis of this appeal and we will pass upon them in their regular order. There were two defenses relied upon by the appellant:

First, that the plaintiff did not exercise that degree of skill and efficiency required of professional base-ball players playing in the league or association to which defendant belonged, and was discharged for inefficiency.

Secondly, that there was a universal and well-known custom observed by all professional base-ball clubs, that the club shall have the right, on ten days' notice, to release any player who does not come up to the requirements of his position and play satisfactorily; that the defendant received the ten days' notice and was discharged.

It will be observed that the contract in this case was a special one, for a precise period, definite in its terms, and is simply an ordinary hiring under a special contract. It is entirely silent as to the degree of skill the plaintiff should possess in the business for which he was employed. In the words of the contract, "he was to play ball for the Baltimore base ball club, the party of the first part for the season of 1892." Now, it is a well-settled rule that the standard of comparison or test of efficiency is that degree of skill, efficiency, and knowledge which is possessed by those of ordinary skill, competency, and standing in the particular trade or business for which they are employed. And as the contract provided for no higher degree of skill than this, none could be required. The supreme court of Pennsylvania lays down the doctrine to be, "where skill, as well as care, is required in performing the undertaking, if the party purport to have skill in the business, and he undertakes for hire, he is bound to the exercise of due and ordinary skill in the employment of his art or business about it, or, in other words, to perform it in a workmanlike manner. In cases of this sort he must be understood to have engaged to use a degree of diligence and attention and skill adequate to the performance of his undertaking. Ordinary skill means that degree which men engaged in that particular art usually employ, not that which belongs to a few men only of extraordinary endowments and capacities. Waugh v. Shunk, 20 Pa. 133; also, Harmer v. Cornelius, 5 C. B. N. S. 236; Parker v. Platt, 74 Ill. 432. This doctrine was fairly submitted to the jury by the first prayer of the plaintiff and the fourth prayer of the defendant, by which they were in substance told that if they found that the plaintiff did not possess and exercise the skill, knowledge, and efficiency possessed and exercised by other professional base-ball players of ordinary skill, knowledge, and efficiency, and that he was discharged for such reasons, then their verdict must be for the defendant. A large number of witnesses, who had been professional base-ball players for six or ten years, and who had played with the plaintiff, testified that they considered him a good player, and that he played an average good game of ball.

We pass now to the second question in the case. The contention on the part of the appellant is that the contract was made subject to a usage or custom that the club had a right to cancel the contract and discharge the player on giving ten days' notice when the player is deficient in his playing. The contract is entirely silent upon this subject, and it is not admitted that the player had the reciprocal right to abandon the club, or to cancel the contract when he deemed it proper or right to do so. We have carefully examined the testimony and find a failure of proof to establish any usage. The evidence was manifestly too vague and unmeaning to warrant upon any principles the submission of any proposition based upon it. The plaintiff testified "that he had been playing professional base-ball for the past nine years; is familiar with the rules of the game, and had signed contracts for professional clubs; that he had never signed a contract with the ten days' clause; that he never even saw one, and knew of no custom by which a player could be discharged that way; that nothing was said about it when he signed. The authorities all hold that a usage to be admissible must be proved to be known to the parties, or be so general and well established that knowledge and adoption of it may be presumed; and it must be certain and uniform. Foley v. Mason, 6 Md. 51; Second Nat. Bank of Baltimore v. Western Nat. Bank of Baltimore, 51 Md. 128, 34 Am. Rep. 800; Citizens Bank of Baltimore v. Grafflin, 81 Md. 520, 1 Am. Rep. 66; Patterson v. Crowther, 70 Md. 125. But conceding that there was sufficient evidence of the custom and usage contended for by the appellant, we are clearly of the opinion that it was not admissible to vary the terms of this special contract. The contract, as we have said, is one for a definite term of service and binding on both parties. To admit the usage would not only destroy its mutuality, but vary its terms. The supreme court of Rhode Island, in a similar case to the one now under consideration, held that a "local usage cannot be considered a part of a contract when it contradicts that contract."

Justices Durfee and Halle, in delivering the opinion of the court, say, the contract and usage cannot stand together. Either the contract must prevail and make void the usage, or the usage must prevail and make void the contract. The contract described in this declaration is not a contract made with reference to the usage, but against it. The contract described is to labor for a year, but the usage terminates it at will. The contract is, by the very fact of its existence, a protest against the usage, for it ceases to be a special contract the moment that the usage is made part of it. A usage which annuls such a contract cannot be given in evidence, without subverting the well-settled rule, that usages inconsistent with a contract cannot be given in evidence to affect it. Sweet v. Jenkins, 1 R. I. 147, 36 Am. Dec. 242. And to the same effect is the case of Peters v.

Staveley, court of queen's bench, where Chief Justice Cockburn holds that the contract being for one week certain, the custom, even if proved, could not control it. 15 L. T. N. S. 275; also Smith v. Sheridan, 32 N. Y. S. R. 23. The same rule has been established by this court in a number of cases. Foley v. Mason, and Citizens Bank of Baltimore v. Grafflin, supra; Susquehanna Fertilizer Co. v. White, 66 Md. 452, 59 Am. Rep. 186; Patterson v. Crowther, supra; First Nat. Bank of Baltimore v. Taliaferro, 72 Md. 165.

It follows then from this view of the case, that there was no error by the court in granting the plaintiff's fourth and fifth prayers, which were to the effect that there was no evidence of any usage by which the plaintiff could be discharged before the end of the contract period without sufficient cause, and the exclusion from the jury of all evidence offered to show the existence of such a usage. The first prayer of the defendant, relative to the existence of the usage, was properly rejected. The third, sixth, and eighth prayers of the defendant were properly rejected, for the reasons we have heretofore given. The first prayer granted on the part of the plaintiff was correct, and contained the law upon that branch of the case. We have examined all the exceptions, and discover no error of which the appellant has a right to complain.

The first, second, fifth, sixth, and seventh exceptions to the admission of evidence are substantially the same and present the question as to the degree of skill required of the plaintiff in the performance of his duty. The evidence was properly rejected because it tended to exact or to establish a higher degree of skill than that contemplated by the contract. The appellant was not a member of the national league at the time the contract was entered into on November 14, 1891, it did not become such until January, 1892. This testimony was, therefore, immaterial and irrelevant. The fourth exception was to the refusal of the court to allow the following question to be answered: "Can you tell whether or not there was any public complaint by the patrons of the manner in which Mr. Picket filled his position." It is unnecessary to pass upon the exception, as the witness afterwards substantially answered the question proposed, and the benefit of his answer. The remaining exception was to the instruction of the court as to the measure of damages. This prayer instructed the jury that if they found for the plaintiff he was entitled to recover the contract price, less such sums as may have been paid to him, and also less such sums as he earned or by the exercise of due diligence might have earned in the line of his business, during the remainder of the period covered by the contract. We think this was unexceptionable, and is the law laid down by this court in Cumberland & P. R. Co. v. Slack, 45 Md. 161. Finding no error and the whole case having been fairly submitted to the jury the judgment will be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

Credits shown by books of account and trial balances are not tangible property which can be made subject to levy under attachment by seizure of the books and papers, since these are not so intimately connected with the demands charged therein that their seizure is equivalent to the seizure of such demands.
2. Attorneys who have abused the process of the court by causing a writ of attachment known to them to be utterly void to issue for the purpose of obtaining custody of the books and private papers of the defendant for the purpose of founding subsequent proceedings upon them and for inquisitorial purposes, will be compelled to surrender such books and any copies containing evidence taken from such books and papers and to make proof that they have surrendered the whole so that it may not be used by them or any one else.
3. Mandamus will lie to compel a judge to set aside an order denying a motion to compel attorneys to surrender books and papers and copies made therefrom, obtained under an abuse of a writ of attachment, by its use as a search warrant for evidence.

(December 23, 1893.)

PETITION for a writ of mandamus to compel respondent to set aside an order denying relator's motion to compel the attorneys for plaintiff in the case of Chett v. Rosenthal to surrender copies of papers which they were alleged to have procured by an abuse of the process of court. Granted.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Bunker & Carpenter, for relator:

The books of account, trial balances and private papers of Rosenthal Bros. were not attachable under the laws of this state.

Thompson v. Thomas, 11 Mich. 376.

One who begins by attachment begins only an ordinary suit. It is a means designed to secure the creditor by the sequestration or holding of property to await the judgment, and out of the property so held the judgment is to be satisfied. In other respects a suit in attachment does not differ in any regard from any other suit. Any property subject to execution may be attached.

King v. Hubbell, 42 Mich. 602.

Books of account, trial balances and the private papers of individuals are not subject to levy on execution or attachment.

The plaintiffs could not have been benefited by attaching the books. There was no value in them per se. They could not be seized on attachment or sold on execution.

Such proceedings as we complain of here have been under the ban of the English common law since the days of the Stuarts.

Search warrants were never recognized by the common law as process which might be availed of by individuals in the course of civil proceedings or for the maintenance of any mere private right but their use was confined to the case of public transactions instituted and pursued for the suppression of crime and the detection and punishment of criminals.

Messrs. Brown & Lovelace for respondent.

Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Relator is garnishee defendant in a cause pending in the Muskegon circuit court, in which Sam Rosenwald, Julius Rosenwald, and Julius Weil are plaintiffs, and Sol Rosenthal and Sam Rosenthal are the principal defendants. The principal cause was commenced by writ of attachment issued out of the circuit court, and the garnishee proceedings are based thereon. After the writ of garnishment was served, Bunker & Carpenter, as attorneys for the garnishee defendant, entered a motion in the cause for an order requiring Norris J. Brown and George S. Lovelace, attorneys for the plaintiffs in the original suit, to deliver up to defendant's counsel all copies taken by them, or either of them, of the books of account, trial balances, and private papers of the firm of Rosenthal Bros., composed of Sol and Sam Rosenthal, the principal defendants, and severally to make oath that, at the time of such delivery, such copies

NOTE.—The above decision strikingly shows the power of a court to prevent any advantage being taken of a party by wrongful use of process. While a precedent for the decision is cited the case is sufficiently novel to attract attention and we know of no mention of the subject in any law text-book or treatise. Quite similar to it in many respects is the case of Simmons Hardware Co. v. Walbel (S. Dak.) 11 L. R. A. 267, in which a surrender of copies wrongfully obtained was ordered although in that case the copies had been obtained by collusion with an agent and not by use of process.

embraced all that said Brown & Lovelace, or either of them, believed existed, and that said Brown & Lovelace be severally restrained from using in any way the books and papers attached in the principal proceeding, or from disclosing their contents, or contents of the copies taken from them, for the purposes of this case, or for any other purpose whatever for the reasons: (1) Because the books of account, trial balances, and private papers are not attachable, under the laws of this state; (2) because said Brown & Lovelace who examined the attached books, trial balances, and papers, and true copies thereof were, and each of them was, guilty of an abuse of their powers and duties as officers of the court, and of the process of the court; (3) because said Brown & Lovelace used the process of the court for an unlawful purpose; (4) because the sheriff of the county exceeded his authority, and was guilty of an abuse of his powers and duties, in permitting said Brown & Lovelace to make an examination of the books and papers so attached, and to take copies therefrom; (5) because said examination was made, and said copies were taken, while said books, trial balances, and papers were in the possession of the sheriff of said county, who then held them under an authorized seizure by virtue of a writ of attachment then in his hands. This motion is based upon the testimony of Mr. Lovelace and of the sheriff, given in the case of George B. Cluett et al. v. Gates L. Rosenthal, garnishee of Sol and Sam Rosenthal, an abstract of which is filed in the cause, and upon an exhibit introduced in evidence in said last-named case, the same being a circular letter written by said Brown & Lovelace to the creditors of the firm of Rosenthal, Bros., and upon certain affidavits filed, and files and records in this cause. The motion was heard in the court below, and denied. Mandamus is asked to compel the court to set aside the order denying the motion, and to grant the order asked.

It appears that, prior to the issuing of any writ of attachment against Rosenthal Bros., they had executed a chattel mortgage to Gates L. Rosenthal, the garnishee defendant here. Proceedings were taken to foreclose that mortgage; and the stock of goods and other property which it covered, amounting to about $30,000, were bid in by Gates L. Rosenthal who claimed, at the time attachment proceedings were commenced, to be in possession. Brown & Lovelace, having a claim in their hands not yet due, sued out a writ of attachment on said claim, placing it in the hands of the sheriff of the county, who entered the store where the properties were situate, and which Gates L. Rosenthal claimed to be in possession of, and seized and took into his possession certain moneys, books of account, paid and canceled checks, trial balances, and other books and papers. He took these books to the county jail, and there permitted Brown & Lovelace, who were plaintiffs' attorneys in the writ, to examine them, and to take copies from them. After this was done, the property so attached was returned to the store and the attachment proceedings discontinued. It is admitted by Brown & Lovelace that they knew that this writ of attachment could not be sustained if a motion was made for its dissolution, as the action was brought upon a debt not yet due, and no sufficient showing had been made in the affidavit to sustain such a writ. Brown & Lovelace, having obtained certain facts from the examination of the books and papers of Rosenthal Bros., sued out a second writ of attachment in the circuit court for Muskegon county in favor of George B. Cluett against Rosenthal Bros., and caused a writ of garnishment to issue against Gates L. Rosenthal. That cause was heard in the circuit court, and is now pending in this court upon appeal. In that case, in order to establish the plaintiff's claim that Rosenthal Bros. had made a fraudulent mortgage, and to show that Gates L. Rosenthal had properties and effects in his hands belonging to the principal defendants, Mr. Lovelace was called as a witness, and was permitted to testify to certain facts which he found by an examination of these books and papers. Upon his cross-examination in that case, it appears that he took copies of such books and papers, including trial balances. It is for the surrender of such papers and copies so taken that this application was made to the court below.

In the Cluett Case, Mr. Lovelace testified fully as to what examination he made, and that after such examination he was in a position to make an affidavit under the law for the issuing of a writ of attachment. From Mr. Lovelace's testimony, it is quite apparent that Brown & Lovelace knew the first writ of attachment could not be sustained under the affidavit upon which it was based, and that the first writ was used for the purpose of getting evidence upon which to ground subsequent writs. No return was ever made to this first writ, but on the contrary the suit was discontinued, and the writ withheld, as soon as the evidence was obtained. It is true that Brown & Lovelace deny that the writ was issued for the purpose of getting this information, but, whether it was issued for that purpose or not, it was so used. In the order to show cause, the circuit judge makes a return in which he says that upon the trial of the Cluett Case an objection was made to the introduction in evidence of the contents of the books of Rosenthal Bros., but that such evidence was allowed, and that the jury in that cause found adversely to the relator; that in the present case the writ of attachment was sued out by Thomas C. Clark, as attorney for plaintiffs, and that Brown & Lovelace were thereafter substituted in his stead. It is further returned that it appears, upon a hearing of the motion, that the books and papers claimed to have been inspected were mortgaged by Sol and Sam Rosenthal to relator, as trustee for himself and other creditors, before said attachment, and which mortgage, if valid, was in force at the time said property was attached, and that relator had no rights or interests in the books and papers, except such as he obtained by said mortgage, and that such books and papers were the property of Sol and Sam Rosenthal, and constituted a part of a large amount of property attached. The return further sets forth that, upon the hearing of the motion, relator made no showing that plaintiffs would use or attempt to use the evidence as to the contents of these books and papers upon the trial of said cause, wherein relator was interested, and that it did not appear that relator was entitled to the copies of the books and papers taken by Brown & Lovelace. From all the evidence the court determined that the writ of attachment was issued in good faith, and executed in good faith, and that there was no abuse of the process of the court, and that Brown & Lovelace ought not to be compelled to surrender such copies, or to make the oath asked.

The return nowhere denies that the mortgage had been foreclosed, and the property bid in by Gates L. Rosenthal. This fact appears from the testimony of Mr. Lovelace, and is nowhere contradicted. But it is assumed, not only that the mortgage is void, but that the sale was also void, and therefore relator had no right to possession, such assumption being based upon the facts obtained by the use of the first writ of attachment. We think there is conclusive evidence that the facts obtained by Brown & Lovelace are a part of the case, and the foundation of the case in hand. The only question involved is, Has there been an abuse of the process of the court? Can parties be permitted to take a writ of attachment, knowing it to be invalid and issued upon an affidavit confessedly defective, and attach property under it which is not subject to levy, and gain information or evidence upon which to base a proper writ, and sustain that writ by such means? It is said by counsel for plaintiffs in the writ, who appear here to defend the action, that it is an effort to have this evidence adjudged incompetent, and for this reason restrain its use, and thus anticipate a ruling of the court below thereon in advance of a trial, and without any showing that it will be offered. This is not the point in issue here, and does not reach the question involved. The claim is that the process of the court has been abused, in that a writ of attachment utterly void, and known to be void by the attorneys causing its issue, and who are officers of the court, has been used to obtain evidence for the purpose of founding subsequent proceedings upon, and for inquisitorial purposes; that, this being so, the evidence thus obtained is not competent for any purpose, and the parties having possession of any copies containing such evidence are bound to surrender them, and make proof that they have surrendered the whole thereof, so that it may not be used by them, or any one else; and that they have no right to the possession of such evidence. In this we think counsel for relator is correct. These books of account and trial balances are not property of such tangible character that they can be made subject to such levies. They may be evidences of debt, but their seizure is not the attaching or seizure of the debt itself. They are not so intimately connected with the demands charged therein that the seizure of the books is equivalent to the seizure of the demand, and there is no means by which these demands can be transferred by a direct levy and sale. Freeman, Executions, § 112; Com. v. Abell, 6 J. J. Marsh. 476; Thomas v. Thomas, 2 A. K. Marsh. 430; Wier v. Davis, 4 Ala. 442; Carlos v. Ansel, 8 Ala. 900; Horton v. Smith, Id. 73, 42 Am. Dec. 628. In Dart v. Woodhouse, 40 Mich. 399, 29 Am. Rep. 544, it was held that a set of manuscript abstract books were not subject to levy and sale on execution. In Perry v. Big Rapids, 67 Mich. 146, it was held that "such abstract books have no intrinsic value, and are not taxable." In Drake on Attachment (4th ed. § 249), it is said: "Where property is of such a nature that an attachment of it would produce a sacrifice and great injury to the defendant, without benefiting the plaintiff, it is not attachable. Such is the rule in relation to defendant's private papers, or his books in which his accounts are kept. Much less would an attachment be considered to create a lien on the accounts contained in the books;" citing Bradford v. Gillespie, 8 Dana, 67. In Dart v. Woodhouse, supra, Mr. Justice Campbell said: "It would be very absurd to hold that books could be seized and sold on execution, which after the sale the purchaser could not use." It is conceded that these books and papers seized were not of any value, in themselves. Mr. Lovelace says they were not of much value, except as evidence. In People v. Wayne County Auditors, 5 Mich. 223, it was held that a levy on a warrant drawn by the board of auditors is not subject to levy on execution. In Bradford v. Gillespie, supra, it was held that a return on an attachment of, "Levied upon an account book, the property of defendant," will not authorize a judgment. As before stated, the real gist of the complaint here is not that property was levied upon which was not subject to levy, but the use which was made of the process of the court. It is seen that the attachment was void, and was levied upon property not subject to levy, yet the parties responsible for it—officers of the court—are permitted to use the evidence thus obtained. If the writ had been valid, and the property taken under it had been subject to levy, it was the duty of the sheriff "to safely keep the same to satisfy any judgment that may be received by the plaintiff in such attachment." How. Stat. § 7990. Instead of doing this, the writ was used as a search warrant for evidence, and, having obtained the evidence sought, the books were returned. Had the defendants been charged with a crime, it would have been necessary, in order to obtain a writ which would accomplish what was accomplished here, to show to the satisfaction of the court that probable cause existed, which showing must have been supported by oath or affirmation, the place particularly described, and a description of the property to be searched for or seized have been set forth with exact particularity. "Search warrants were never recognized by the common law as process which might be availed of by individuals in the course of criminal proceedings, or for the maintenance of any mere private rights; but their use was confined to the case of public transactions instituted and pursued for the suppression of crime, and the detection and punishment of criminals." Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 878. Article 6, § 26, of our own state constitution, provides: "The person, houses, papers and possession of every person shall be secure from unreasonable searches or seizures. No warrant to search any place or to seize any person or things shall issue without describing them, nor without probable cause supported by oath or affirmation." Here the parties were charged with no crime, yet upon a void process—one which the parties causing its issue confessedly knew to be void—a levy is made upon property not subject to seizure, and copies made thereof; and these copies are now held by these officers, and have actually been permitted to be used in one case as evidence, and in the present case are the foundation upon which the writ was issued. But one case has been called to our attention where such a proceeding has before been attempted. In Hergman v. Detlebach, 11 How. Pr. 46, it appears that a deputy sheriff, under an attachment, levied upon certain books, papers, letters, and correspondence of a partnership. It was held that under the New York statute the books of a partnership were subject to levy, but letters and correspondence were not among those authorized to be taken. It was said: "As the whole proceeding on the part of the deputy in examining the books and papers is grossly irregular, an order must be made that the regular books of account of the firm, and its notes, policies of insurance, and all other securities and vouchers, be safely kept by the sheriff under lock and key, without power on the part of such deputy or any other person, except the defendants, to look into or examine the same, except under the special order of the court, to be made on notice to the defendants." It was further said: "All other papers, of every name and description, taken by such deputy, and all translations or copies of such translations, if any, of the books, letters, vouchers, or papers, must be delivered up forthwith to the defendants' attorneys; and, to insure the same, such delivery must be made under an affidavit to be made by such deputy, by the plaintiffs, and their attorneys and counsel, that, at the time of such delivery, such copies embraced every translation or copy of such translation or copy of such original which the deponent knows of or believes, or has any reason to believe, exists; and the plaintiffs, and their attorneys, agents, and counselors, are hereby restrained from in any way using such original books and papers, or using or disclosing the contents of such copies, in any manner whatsoever, except by special order of the court. This order must be complied with forthwith." The process of courts of justice can never be used for inquisitorial purposes or for oppression, and such use be sustained. If such a practice should be countenanced, no man's private papers would be free from search or seizure.

The writ must be granted as prayed.

The other Justices concur.

PEOPLE of the State of Michigan

v.

Michael BELLET, Plff. in Err.

(.....Mich.....)

The equal privileges or immunities of citizens are not violated by prohibiting the business of a barber on Sunday under greater penalties than those imposed upon other business, or because an exception is made as to those who conscientiously observe the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath, nor is such a statute invalid as class legislation.

(February 20, 1904.)

ERROR to the Recorder's Court of Detroit to review a judgment convicting defendant of unlawfully engaging in the business of a barber on Sunday. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. George F. Robinson for plaintiff in error.

Mr. A. A. Ellis, Atty. Gen., with Messrs. Allan H. Fraser, Pros. Atty., and Ormund F. Hunt, Asst. Pros. Atty., for defendant in error:

All Sunday laws are police regulations, and the prevention of a trespass is the invariable purpose of a police regulation. Therefore, it is unquestioned that noisy trades and amusements and other like disturbances, may be prohibited on that day in complete conformity with the limitations of police power.

State v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 15 W. Va. 362, 36 Am. Rep. 808.

But there is a constitutional reason why the prohibition of labor on Sunday should be extended to other than noisy trades and employments.

Laws public in their object may extend to all citizens or be confined to particular classes.

The 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States means that no person or class of persons shall be denied the same protection of the laws which is enjoyed by other persons or other classes in the same place, and under like circumstances.

NOTE.—The constitutionality of a Sunday law is attacked in the above case on grounds somewhat different from those considered in JUDFIND v. STATE, post. 721. The question of class legislation or of equal privileges and immunities of citizens is here the basis of attack, but even the fact of discrimination in respect to penalties between barbers and other persons is held not to take the case out of the general rule, which upholds Sunday regulations.

As to what constitutes an unconstitutional discrimination between citizens, see note to Louisville Safety Vault & T. Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Ky.) 14 L. R. A. 579.

As to what constitutes Sunday labor which is prohibited, see note to Quarles v. State (Ark.) 14 L. R. A. 192.

Missouri v. Lewis, 101 U. S. 81, 25 L. ed. 992.

The provision in the amendment just referred to does not prohibit the legislature from making laws applying only to certain classes or localities.

The distinction between this kind of legislation and class legislation, so called, is very clearly stated by Judge Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations, at page 483.

Uniformity of laws is attained by their operation upon all persons in like situations.

Iowa Railroad Land Co. v. Soper, 39 Iowa, 112; United States Exp. Co. v. Ellyson, 28 Iowa, 870; McAunich v. Mississippi & M. River R. Co. 20 Iowa, 838; *Haskel v. See also Ex parte Smith and Ex parte Keating, 38 Cal. 702; Ex parte Burke, 59 Cal. 6.

Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, 6th ed. page 584, says: "The Jew who is forced to respect the first day of the week when his conscience requires of him the observance of the seventh also, may plausibly urge that the law discriminates against his religion, and by forcing him to keep a second Sabbath in each week, unjustly, though by indirection, punishes him for his belief."

We have not found any decision in the state of Michigan which purports to show that it has ever been contended in this state that the above provision of the Michigan statutes, making exception in favor of those classes who observe the seventh day of the week, is unconstitutional.

Johns v. State, 78 Ind. 332, 41 Am. Rep. 577.

Is the work of a barber one of necessity? It has been held, both in England and this country, it is not.

Whether or not shaving is a work of necessity, the opening of barber shops as such are not necessary, within the meaning of the law; and if the legislature sees fit in its discretion to enact additional legislation in furtherance of the same design it may lawfully do so.

State v. Fernandez, 39 La. Ann. 538; Com. v. Matthews, 18 L. R. A. 761, 152 Pa. 166; Merchants Wharf Boat Asso. v. Wood, 64 Miss. 661, 60 Am. Rep. 76; People v. Moses, 65 Hun, 161; Neuendorff v. Duryea, 69 N. Y. 557, 25 Am. Rep. 235; Lindenmuller v. People, 33 Barb. 548.

The question of how far these restrictions should be carried is for the legislature, not for the courts.

Lieberman v. State, 26 Neb. 464.

Montgomery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The respondent was convicted of a violation of the provisions of Act No. 148 of the Public Acts of 1893, and the sole question presented for our consideration is whether the act in question is constitutional. The act provides: "That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons to carry on or engage in the art or calling of hair cutting, shaving, hair dressing and shampooing, or in any work pertaining to the trade or business of a barber, on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, except such person or persons shall be employed to exercise such art or calling in relation to a deceased person on said day. Sec. 2: That it shall be unlawful for any such person or persons to keep open their shops or places of business aforesaid, on said first day of the week commonly called Sunday for any of the purposes mentioned in section one of this act: provided, however, that nothing in this act shall apply to persons who conscientiously believe the seventh day of the week should be observed as the Sabbath and who actually refrain from secular business on that day."

It is urged that the act is invalid because it conflicts with article 6 of section 32 of the Constitution of this state, which provides, among other things, that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, and for the further reason that it is in conflict with the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of the citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction, the equal protection of the laws." It is conceded that the state, in the exercise of its police power, has the right to enact Sunday laws, and that it also has the right to provide for the regulation and restriction of those engaged in an employment which, in and of itself, may prove harmful to the community, such as the liquor traffic. But it is contended that the business of conducting a barber shop is not of this class, and that it is in the nature of class legislation to prohibit this business under more severe penalties than those provided for the conduct of other legitimate business on Sunday. We do not deem the act in question open to such objection. By class legislation, we understand such legislation as denies rights to one which are accorded to others, or inflicts upon one individual a more severe penalty than is imposed upon another, in like case, offending.

In Cooley on Constitutional Limitations (page 482), it is said: "Laws public in their objects may, unless express constitutional provision forbids, be either general or local in their application. They may embrace many subjects or one, and they may extend to all citizens, or be confined to particular classes, as minors or married women, bankers or traders, and the like. . . . The legislature may also deem it desirable to prescribe peculiar rules for the several occupations, and to establish distinctions in the rights, obligations, duties, and capacities of citizens. The business of common carriers, for instance, or of bankers, may require special statutory regulations for the general benefit; and it may be matter of public policy to give laborers in one business a specific lien for their wages, when it would be impracticable or impolitic to do the same for persons engaged in some other employments. If the laws be otherwise unobjectionable, all that can be required, in these cases, is that they be general in their application to the class or locality to which they apply; and they are then public in character, and of their propriety and policy the legislature must judge." In Lieberman v. State, 26 Neb. 464, an ordinance of the city prohibited the keeping open of any business house, bank, store, saloon, or office, excepting telegraph offices, express offices, photograph galleries, railroad offices, telephone offices, hotels, restaurants, cigar stores, eating houses, ice-cream parlors, drug stores, etc. It was contended that the ordinance was open to the objection that it did not operate upon all citizens alike; that the respondent was compelled to close his place of business on Sunday, while drug stores, tobacco houses, and others in competition in business, were not required to do so. But the court held the act valid. In the present case it may have been the judgment of the legislature that those engaged in the particular calling were more likely to offend against the law of the state providing for Sunday closing than those engaged in other callings. If so, it became a question of policy as to whether a more severe penalty should not be provided for engaging in that particular business on Sunday than that inflicted upon others who refuse to cease from their labors one day in seven.

2. Another question which naturally presents itself, but which has not been discussed by respondent's counsel is whether the law is open to the objection that it is class legislation, for the reason that those who observe the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath are excepted from its provisions.

It has been held in one case Shreveport v. Levy, 26 La. Ann. 671, 21 Am. Rep. 558, that such a provision is unconstitutional because it discriminates between religious sects. But we find that such an exception to the general statute of this state relative to the observance of Sunday has been in force since 1846. See How. Anno. Stat. § 2021. And while this question has never been directly passed upon, the validity of the act in question has been assumed in a large number of cases.

A similar question was raised in Johns v. State, 78 Ind. 332, 41 Am. Rep. 577, and it was held not to conflict with a provision of the constitution which reads: "The general assembly shall not grant to any citizen, or to any class of citizens, privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not belong equally to all citizens." It was said: "The framers of the statute meant to leave it to the consciences and judgments of the citizens to choose between the first and seventh day of the week. One or the other of these days, they must refrain from common labor. Which it shall be is to be determined by their own consciences. It was not the purpose of the lawmakers to compel any class of conscientious persons to abstain from labor upon two days in every week." The supreme court of Ohio has gone so far as to hold that a statute which did not contain such an exception was for that reason unconstitutional. See Cincinnati v. Rice, 15 Ohio, 225; Canton v. Nist, 9 Ohio St. 439.

The better reason for maintaining the police power to prohibit citizens from engaging in secular pursuits on Sunday is the necessity of such regulation as a sanitary measure. As to those employments which are noiseless, and harmless in themselves, and conducted in a manner not calculated to offend those who, from religious scruples, observe Sunday as the Lord's day, this necessity appears to be the only valid source of legislative power; and this is based upon the fact that experience has demonstrated that one day's rest is requisite for the health of most individuals, and not all individuals possess the power to observe a day of rest of their own volition. As is well said by Mr. Tiedeman: "If the law did not interfere, the feverish, intense desire to acquire wealth, so thoroughly characteristic of the American nation, would ultimately prevent, not only the wage earners, but likewise the capitalists and employers themselves, from yielding to the warnings of nature, and obeying the instincts of self-preservation, by resting periodically from labor, even if the mad pursuit of wealth should not warp their judgment and destroy this instinct. Remove the prohibition of law, and this wholesome sanitary regulation would cease to be observed." Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, 181.

In Cooley on Constitutional Limitations (page 477), it is said: "It appears to us that, if the benefit of the individual is alone to be considered, the argument against the law which he may make who has already observed the first day of the week is unanswerable. The obligation to cease from secular pursuits on one day of the week does not discriminate either in his favor or against him."

We think the statute under consideration is within the police power of the state, and not in conflict with any express provision of the constitution, and that it does not conflict with the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. It follows that the conviction should be affirmed, and the case remanded, with directions to the recorder to proceed to judgment.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

Arthur F. ODLIN, Appt.,

v.

Seth WOODRUFF, Tax Collector of Orange County.

(31 Fla. 100.)

If a tax collector seizes personal property to enforce a tax levied under anHeadnote by TAYLOR, J.NOTE.—Injunction to restrain the collection of illegal taxes.General doctrine against.

Upon this question the courts are not harmonious in their opinions, which are to some extent irreconcilable.

Generally speaking relief is refused upon the ground that to grant it, except in extreme cases, would be an interference with the powers of government leading to grave and serious consequences, as stopping the collection of revenue without which no government can exist.

Injunction is the strong arm of equity, that never ought to be extended unless to cases of great injury, where courts of law cannot afford an adequate or commensurate remedy in damages. Bona parte v. Camden & A. R. Co. Baldw. 205, 218.

The power to tax is vested in the sovereign authority of the state, no constitutional government can exist without it; its exercise is essential to the very existence of the state government. Linton v. Athens, 53 Ga. 588.

All regular governments subsist by means of taxes, which are assessed, levied, and collected under laws necessarily stringent and summary, in order to insure prompt payment. It is therefore obvious that the courts should not interfere, by injunction, with the regular working of these laws, unless an injury to the citizen will be thereby inflicted, for which he has no other adequate remedy. Parmley v. St. Louis, 1 M. & S. R. Co. 8 Dill. 18.

It does not belong to the jurisdiction of chancery, as a court of equity, to review or control the determination of supervision, but the review and correction of all errors, mistakes, and abuses in the exercise of the powers of subordinate public jurisdictions, and in the official acts of public officers, belong to the supreme court, and have always been a matter of legal and not of equitable cognizance. Magee v. Cutler, 43 Barb. 239; Mooers v. Smedley, 6 Johns. Ch. 23, 31, 2 L. ed. 43, 44; Wiggins v. New York, 9 Paige, 16, 4 L. ed. 591; Heywood v. Buffalo, 14 N. Y. 534; Susquehanna Bank v. Broome County Suprs. 25 N. Y. 314.

Equity cannot look into the proceedings of subordinate tribunals of special or local jurisdictions with a view to setting them aside if void at law, or for the purpose of staying or restraining such proceedings. Thatcher v. Dusenbury, 9 How. Pr. 32; Bouton v. Brooklyn, 15 Barb. 375.

The policy of the law is against the granting of an injunction to prevent the collection of taxes, the wheels of government being liable to be stopped thereby. Messeck v. Columbia County Suprs. 60 Barb. 190.

No court of equity will allow its injunction to issue to restrain their action, except where it may be necessary to protect the rights of the citizen whose property is taxed and he has no adequate remedy by the ordinary processes of the law. Dows v. Chicago, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 108, 20 L. ed. 65; Milwaukee v. Koeffer, 116 U. S. 219, 29 L. ed. 612, 23 L. R. A.

act that is unconstitutional, such seizure would be a trespass for the redress of which there is ample remedy at law. A court of equity has no jurisdiction to restrain a trespass upon personal property except in rare cases where the property has some peculiar intrinsic value to the owner that could not be compensated in money. The case of Young v. Thomas, 17 Fla. 103, involving the constitutionality of a license tax on lawyers, approvingly referred to.

The court does not sit to correct errors or mistakes of law, and cannot attempt to prevent any more than will redress all wrongs. Frost v. Flick, 1 Dak. 128.

Judicial interference is, as a general rule, denied in the collection of state taxes. Georgia Code, § 3868; Decker v. McGowan, 59 Ga. 805; Georgia Mut. L. Asso. v. McGowan, Id. 811.

Its use rests in the sound discretion of the court. Cutting v. Gilbert, 5 Blatchf. 259.

Where the tax is assessed in the ordinary way, and unaccompanied by any circumstances of peculiar injury, relief will not lie, even though the act authorizing the tax be unconstitutional. McCoy v. Chillicothe, 3 Ohio, 370, 17 Am. Dec. 607; Mechanics & T. Branch of State Bank v. Deboit, 1 Ohio St. 591; Exchange Bank of Columbus v. Hines, 3 Ohio St. 1.

There can be no interference where the consequences would be only a trifle less serious and injurious by allowing the tax to be collected. Harkness v. Board of Public Works, 1 McArth. 121.

Where the law is constitutional although the powers under it may be irregular or erroneous, equity will not interfere by way of injunction, the remedy at law being complete. Livingston v. Hollenbeck, 4 Barb. 9.

If the assessment be illegal or unconstitutional, its payment cannot be enforced, and the plaintiff cannot anticipate his defense to a suit at law by application for injunction. Blake v. Brooklyn, 26 Barb. 301.

The same was the ruling of the court in Hoboken Land & Imp. Co. v. Hoboken, 31 N. J. Eq. 462, where the plaintiffs sought relief upon the ground that they were exempt under the Act of 1874 (Pub. Laws 1874, p. 402) although they did not deny liability to taxation as to other moneys.

But when relief was sought against the sale of real estate for delinquent taxes, the owner having sufficient personal property, the court granted an injunction. Abbott v. Edgerton, 53 Ind. 198.

So equity has interfered where the property was not subject to taxation. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. McLean County, 17 Ill. 261.

Even to prevent the assessment and collection of a tax about to be levied under color of a public law. But in all such cases it is upon some peculiar ground of equity jurisdiction. Hoagland v. Delaware Twp. 17 N. J. Eq. 108.

Courts of equity, and particularly the federal courts, sitting in equity in the states, exercise great caution in interfering with the collection of revenues by the states, or their public or municipal agencies. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Lincoln County, 2 Dill. 279.

Foundation of jurisdiction.

The fundamental law of the land must be violated. Linton v. Athens, 53 Ga. 588; Cummings v. Merchants Nat. Bank of Toledo, 101 U. S. 153, 25 L. ed. 908.

The very groundwork of taxation must be affected. Kaehler v. Dobberpuhl, 56 Wis. 480.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court for Orange County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enjoin defendant from enforcing the collection of a license tax. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. Arthur F. Odlin in propria persona for appellant.

Mr. William B. Lamar, Atty-Gen., for appellee.

Taylor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The fourteenth subdivision of section 9 of chapter 4010, Laws approved June 10, 1891, provides as follows: "All dentists and lawyers, practicing their profession in the state of Florida, shall pay to the tax collector, in the counties where their office is located, a license tax of ten dollars." The general rule that equity will not interfere is any business or profession mentioned therein unless a state license shall have been procured from the tax collector, which license shall be issued to each person on receipt of the amount therein provided; and further provides that counties, incorporated cities, and towns may impose such further taxes of the same kind upon the same subjects as they may deem proper when the business, profession, or occupation shall be engaged in within their boundaries, provided, that such further tax so imposed shall not exceed fifty per cent of the state tax. Section 10 of the same chapter provides that if any person, firm, or association shall carry on or conduct any business or profession for which a license is required, without first obtaining such license, he shall, except in such cases as are otherwise provided for in said act, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall be punished by a fine of not

In Missouri River, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. v. Morris, 7 Kan. 210, 231, it was held that equity would not interfere by way of injunction with the collection of a tax that is merely voidable, unless strong grounds for interference exist.

Where law and equity are administered separately, and by different modes of procedure, an injunction will not lie to prevent the collection of even a void tax, unless the case presents some peculiar grounds for equity jurisdiction, as the prevention of a multiplicity of suits, or the removal of a cloud upon title, or when an action at law cannot afford an adequate remedy. Delphi v. Bowen, 61 Ind. 29.

appellant thereupon filed his bill in equity in the circuit court of Orange county against the appellee, as tax collector of said county, alleging therein that he was a member of the bar of said circuit court, and had been such member since the 31st day of December, 1885, on which day he was granted a license to practice the profession of law by said circuit court, and that ever since then he has continued in the practice of said profession in the various courts of this state, and has an office for such practice in the city of Orlando.

The bill assails the foregoing statute as being unconstitutional in so far as it affects the

If the tax has been illegally imposed or there is a valid objection upon the face of the proceeding, there is an adequate remedy at law and equity will not interfere. De Witt v. Hays, 3 Cal. 469, 56 Am. Dec. 352; Robinson v. Gaar, 6 Cal. 275; Merrill v. Gorham, 6 Cal. 41.

Under the Nebraska laws there is a complete remedy at law before the county board of equalization, and relief in equity is denied. Burlington & M. River R. Co. v. Seward County Comrs. 10 Neb. 211.

A remedy prescribed by law must be followed. O'Neal v. Virginia & M. Bridge Co. 18 Md. 1, 79 Am. Dec. 699; Deane v. Todd, 22 Mo. 90; Hughes v. Kline, 30 Pa. 227.

Yet in a proper case it will be granted independent of statutory remedy. Corrothers v. Clinton Dist. Board of Education of Monongalia County, 16 W. Va. 527.

But equity will assume jurisdiction when both parties consent to leave the case to its decision, even though there may be a complete remedy at law. Modus et conventio vincunt legem. Bank of Utica v. Utica, 4 Paige, 389, 3 L. ed. 487, 27 Am. Dec. 71.

d. Necessity of payment, etc., of tax due.

Where the relief is sought by reason of the irregularity or erroneousness of the assessment, or its excessiveness, the court will refuse to interfere except the amount actually due and owing be first paid or tendered, it being one of the maxims of equity that he who seeks equity must do equity. Huntington v. Palmer, 7 Sawy. 355; German Nat. Bank of Chicago v. Kimball, 103 U. S. 732, 23 L. ed. 469; Pelton v. Commercial Nat. Bank of Cleveland, 101 U. Rep. 619; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Ryan, 2 Wyo. 408; Stuart v. Meyer, 54 Md. 454.

And this is so no matter whether the tax be general or special. Lawrence v. Killam, 11 Kan. 499; Challies v. Atchison County Comrs. 15 Kan. 49.

Irregularity must be shown and payment or tender made. Pillsbury v. Humphrey, 26 Mich. 245; Cheney v. Jones, 14 Fla. 597.

And there must be no demand of a receipt in full. State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575, 23 L. ed. 693.

A mere offer to pay or payment into court is not enough. Parmley v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 3 Dill. 25.

But in Connors v. Detroit, 41 Mich. 123, the failure to tender amount due was held not to be a ground for the refusal of relief if the claimant concedes an amount due and offer to pay it, but he will subject himself to costs by reason of such non-tender before action.

And the averment of an offer to pay the amount due was held unnecessary when the bill stated the amount illegal. Clement v. Everest, 29 Mich. 19.

The use of every other means of relief must be shown; and willingness to pay alleged. Rio Grande R. Co. v. Scanlan, 44 Tex. 649.

No tender is necessary, however, in the case of a void assessment, as distinguished from an excessive one. Albany City Nat. Bank v. Maher, 20 Blatchf. 341.

Relief granted.

a. Multiplicity of suits.

Whenever the relief sought is such that it will prevent multiplicity of suits, equity will interfere by way of injunction to restrain the collection of an illegal tax. Dundee Mortgage Trust Investment Co. v. School Dist. No. 1, Multnomah County, 19 Fed. Rep. 359.—where taxes were levied upon mortgages and notes under a void law, as contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment as against due process of law; Coulson v. Portland, Deady, 481.—where a tax levied in payment of illegal interest coupons was enjoined; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gaines, 2 Flipp. 621.—a case of a tax upon property exempt from taxation; City Nat. Bank of Paducah v. Paducah, 2 Flipp. 61.—where an illegal tax upon personal property was restrained, the law imposing a tax upon bank shares against stockholders being void; Wells Fargo & Co. v. Dayton, 11 Nev. 161; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Ryan, 113 U. S. 516, 23 L. ed. 1098; Hannewinkle v. Georgetown, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 547, 21 L. ed. 231; *New York L. Ins. Co. v. complainant, and urges that it conflicts with that provision of the constitution of the United States that prohibits the states from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts. That the license to the complainant to practice law, granted December 31, 1885, was a grant from the state of Florida, by the implied terms of which he acquired the vested right to practice law in this state, subject only to be deprived of that right by reason of misconduct, etc.

The bill prays that the said license tax may be declared null and void as to the complainant, and that the defendant, as tax collector,

Where the question involved the validity of the whole tax and assessment upon every person, relief was granted. Sherman v. Benford, 10 R. I. 559.

Relief was granted upon this ground where the necessary consent of the majority of property owners was not obtained, in Holland v. Baltimore, supra.

c. Inadequate legal remedy.

And where the remedy imposed by law is inadequate or incomplete, equity will grant relief against the collection of an illegal tax. De Witt v. Hays, 2 Cal. 463, 56 Am. Dec. 353; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gaines, 2 Flipp. 621.—a case of an unconstitutional tax by reason of its assessment upon property exempt; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Lincoln County, 2 Dill. 279; Dows v. Chicago, 78 U. may be perpetually enjoined from enforcing the collection thereof. The bill was demurred to for want of equity. This demurrer was sustained and the bill dismissed, and from this order the appellant appeals here.

That the court of equity has no jurisdiction to interfere by injunction to restrain trespass upon personal property, except in rare cases where the property trespassed upon or taken has some peculiar intrinsic value to the owner that could not be compensated in money; and that the remedy is at law, is well settled in this

.d. Cloud upon title.

Equity has entertained jurisdiction to restrain the collection of an illegal tax the groundwork of which is wanting, where it has been shown that the refusal of relief would cast a cloud upon the title to real estate which the court of chancery could alone remove. Alexander v. Dennison, 2 McArthur. 562; Harkness v. Board of Public Works, 1 McArthur. 121,—when the illegality is shown by evidence afundae; Dows v. Chicago, 78 U. Fond du Lac, 38 Wis. 470; Johnson v. Milwaukee, 40 Wis. 815.

In such cases the proceedings appear valid upon their face, and extrinsic evidence is required to prove the contrary. Greedup v. Franklin County, 30 Ark. 101; Hare v. Carnall, 39 Ark. 196; Burr v. Hunt, 18 Cal. 303; Sewall v. St. Paul, 20 Minn. 511, 525; Scribner v. Allen, 12 Minn. 148; Minnesota Lined Oil Co. v. Palmer, 20 Minn. 468; South Platte Land Co. v. But where the assessment is void upon its very face, the record casts no cloud upon title and no relief will be granted. Hanne-winkle v. Georgetown, 32 U. S. 15 Wall. 547, 21 L. ed. 23; Harkness v. Board of Public Works, 1 McArthur. 121; Floyd v. Gilbreath, 27 Ark. 675,—where it was sought to enjoin a tax as contrary to the provisions of the Act of March 27, 1871; Hollister v. In such a case the complainant would have a valid defense in an action of ejectment by the purchaser. Livingston v. Hollenbeck, 4 Barb. 8; Van Doren v. New York, 9 Paige, 383, 4 L. ed. 743; Mooers v. Some courts have held, that where the legislature, unjustly, and with the improper motive of increasing the revenues of a city, have brought within its limits and subject to its taxation, property purely agricultural in its nature, and so situated as not to receive the benefits of city government, conveniences and regulations, taxation upon such property will be restrained. *Covington v. Although the above is the general rule with regard to the restraining, by injunction, the collection of taxes against personal property, yet it seems that no difference between taxes upon personal and real property is made by the courts of Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, and Kentucky, relief being granted by the courts in these states in both classes of cases.

Equity will not enjoin the collection of a personal tax or fee by an officer where there is no ground of apprehension of an attempt to enforce it contrary to the plaintiff's will. Crawford v. Bradford, 23 Fla. 404.

Simon PRUESSNER et al.

*1. The courts, in the due administration of justice, will not enforce a contract in violation of law, or permit a plaintiff to recover upon a transaction against public policy, even if the invalidity of the contract or transaction be not specially pleaded.

2. Where a mortgagee, residing in this state, owns and has in his possession a note for $1,700, secured by a mortgage upon real estate in this state, and pretends to transfer, by merely indorsing his name thereon, but without actually delivering the same, such note and mortgage to his father in another state, without any demand being made upon him to do so, to secure $450 and interest for prior borrowed money, but really for the purpose of evading the payment of taxes justly due the state,—Held that, in an action brought in the name of the father to recover upon the note and mortgage, the mortgagee, on account of his acts in evading the payment of taxes, and thereby defrauding the revenues of the state, cannot have any recovery in the name of his father or otherwise on any part of the note or mortgage belonging to him. Held, also, that if the father did not have any knowledge of such alleged transfer, and his name is used to collect such note and mortgage without his consent, or if he merely accepted the note and mortgage as a particeps criminis, to defraud the revenue laws, no recovery of any amount thereon can be had in his name.

3. Where a husband and wife jointly convey a homestead in exchange for other real estate to be occupied by them as a new homestead, upon which there is a prior mortgage, and the husband, with the consent of the wife, takes the conveyance of such real estate in his own name, and expressly assumes the payment of the mortgage thereon, the wife cannot, in an action to foreclose the mortgage, defend against it upon the ground that the real estate so purchased is a homestead, and therefore that the prior mortgage thereon at the date of the exchange is null and void.

4. Where a higher rate of interest is expressly reserved to be paid after maturity, such amount is recoverable, if not prohibited by statute.

5. Where a judgment is rendered upon two different notes, and for the foreclosure of two different mortgages given to secure the same,—one in favor of the plaintiff, and one in favor of a co-defendant,—and the judgment on the note and the foreclosure of the mortgage in favor of the plaintiff are erroneous for want of sufficient evidence, it is error for the trial court to provide in the decree that upon the sale of the real estate all of the costs involved in the case, including the costs taxed upon the erroneous judgment, shall be first paid from the proceeds of such sale.

(January 6, 1894.)

ERROR to the District Court for Shawnee County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to foreclose a mortgage. Reversed.

Statement by Horton, Ch. J.:

This action was brought in the district court of Shawnee county by Simon Pruessner against Joseph L. Sheldon et al., May 5, 1891, to foreclose a mortgage given by Joseph L. Sheldon and wife to Henry S. Pruessner to secure the sum of \$1,700 and interest. Afterwards Lewis M. Motter filed his answer, setting up and claiming a mortgage of \$1,000, given by Henry S. Pruessner and wife as a prior lien upon the lands and tenements described in plaintiff's mortgage, being the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 16, township 13, range 16, in Shawnee county. Joseph L. Sheldon and his wife, Lizzie S. Sheldon, filed separate answers to the plaintiff's petition, and also filed separate replies to the answer of their codefendant, Lewis M. Motter. The case was tried on the 5th of December, 1891, and judgment rendered for Simon

NOTE.—The decision that a transfer of a mortgage to evade taxation is so far contrary to public policy that the transferee cannot enforce it for the benefit of the transferor seems to be a novel one. The exact effect of such a transfer on the rights of the parties is left somewhat indefinite. Whether the transferee could enforce the mortgage if he chose actively to assert his rights for himself, and whether on the other hand the transferor could in his own name enforce the mortgage are important questions left open in this case.

Pruessner for $1,700, and interest at 7 per cent per annum, and his mortgage foreclosed and adjudged to be a second lien upon the premises described. Judgment was also rendered in favor of Lewis M. Motter against Henry S. Pruessner and wife for the sum of $1,000 and interest at 12 per cent per annum from date of default, which sum was adjudged to be a first lien upon the same premises. Joseph L. Sheldon and his wife, Lizzie S. Sheldon, bring the case to this court.

Mr. H. C. Root, for plaintiffs in error:

The mortgage made by Joseph L. Sheldon, and wife, Lizzie S. Sheldon, was executed to Henry S. Pruessner on the 6th day of June, 1888; at that time the title to the land was in Henry S. Pruessner; he did not convey the land to Joseph L. Sheldon until about the 14th of June, 1888.

The mortgage of the Sheldons could not convey any interest in the land, because at this time they had no title or interest to mortgage.

Simon Pruessner, the plaintiff, did not own the Sheldon mortgage for $1,700 when this suit was commenced and therefore was not the real party in interest.

There is simply a blank indorsement upon the note and the assignment on the mortgage is not acknowledged.

An indorsement requires a delivery of the note by the indorsee himself with the intention of passing the property in the note.

Henry S. Pruessner's motive for the alleged assignment to his father Simon Pruessner is very bad, and shows on his part an utter disregard for all law.

Courts cannot lend their aid to any such purpose, it being abhorrent to justice.

He who saves a sum of money by evading the payment of a tax does exactly the same injury to society as he who steals so much from the treasury, and is therefore guilty of as great immorality, or as great an act of dishonesty.

This court will follow the unbroken line of authority, and will maintain the tax laws of this state and the dignity and integrity of the courts of justice by dismissing this cause at expense of the plaintiff and thereby say to him, and Henry S. Pruessner, the real party in interest, you have undertaken to defraud the state out of its revenues and the court will let you fight your battles single handed.

Mr. A. Bergen also for defendants in error.

Horton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the answer of Joseph L. Sheldon to the petition of Simon Pruessner upon the note and mortgage executed by Sheldon and his wife to Henry S. Pruessner on June 6, 1888, for $1,700, with interest, it was denied, among other things, that Simon Pruessner was the holder or owner of the note and mortgage; and it was also denied that he had any interest therein, the allegation being that the alleged transfer to him was colorable only, and without consideration. It appears from the evidence of Henry S. Pruessner that his indebtedness to his father before the transfer of the note and mortgage was $450. If he had given the note secured by the mortgage to his father, or if he had sold the note in good faith to his father for $450 only, or for any other sum, Simon Pruessner might be entitled, as the holder and owner thereof, to recover the amount with interest, and also to have a foreclosure of the mortgage. If it were not for the general finding of the trial court in favor of Simon Pruessner, there would be no trouble whatever in this case. Simon Pruessner, the father, lives in Missouri. Henry Pruessner, the son, lives in Shawnee county, in this state.

Henry testified, among other things, as follows: "In order to get rid of paying taxes on the note and interest I owed, I sold the note to my father. In fact, I have not got anything of the money. Therefore I sold to father, being I owed a part to him; and in case I want any more I will get it of him, because I am a poor man, and I cannot afford to pay taxes on an amount I have not got, and pay interest on the same amount at the same time. Q. How did you sell it (the note) to him (your father)? A. I wrote him. Q. What did you write him? A. A letter. Q. What were the contents of the letter? A. It was being I owed him some money. Q. For what? A. I borrowed it. Q. When? A. Just before I made that transfer. Q. How much did you borrow? A. Four hundred and fifty dollars. Q. Four hundred and fifty dollars? A. Yes, sir. Q. How was that four hundred and fifty dollars given to you? A. By note. Q. What was the date of the note? A. I could not say. Q. Was the note ever paid? A. No, sir. Q. What cash did you ever get from your father? A. That much cash. Q. When? A. I could not state the exact time. Q. How did you get it? Did he pay you cash in hand? A. He sent a part and paid a part in cash. Sent by money order and registered letter. Q. Can you locate the year in which the four hundred and fifty dollars was paid? A. No, sir. Q. Was it 1890? A. No, sir. Q. Was it 1888? A. It was before we had any transaction,—before I disposed of the property. Q. That would make it before 1888? A. Yes, sir. Q. Before Sheldon bought? A. Yes, sir. Q. What about the balance of this mortgage? How much do you claim the Sheldons are owing you? A. Seventeen hundred dollars. Q. What was to become of the balance of the seventeen hundred dollars, when collected, after the paying of the four hundred and fifty dollars? A. Father holds it. Q. For you? A. Yes, sir."

The note and mortgage were not transferred at the time that any of the money was borrowed. No demand was made upon Henry for security by his father, or for any transfer of the note or mortgage. They bear the blank indorsement of Henry, but it does not appear that they were delivered personally to Simon Pruessner, or that he employed the attorney to commence this action. It does appear that one of his brothers supports him; that Henry employed the attorney; and that the note and mortgage have been either in his possession or the possession of the attorney all the time. Henry was present at the trial, and seems to have been very much interested. Simon Pruessner was not present at the trial; neither was his deposition read. Construing all of the evidence as favorably as possible for Simon Pruessner, it appears that the note was merely transferred by Henry to evade the payment of taxes justly due in this state, and thereby to defraud the revenues of the state. His claim that he wanted to secure $450 of borrowed money due his father seems rather a mere incident of the transfer,—the excuse, but not the controlling motive. The uncontradicted evidence is that the transfer of the note and mortgage was made "to get rid of paying taxes."

We could fairly sustain the general finding of the trial court upon the Pruessner mortgage if Henry had not testified that the transfer was made "to get rid of paying taxes," and because "he was a poor man, and could not afford to pay taxes." This evidence does not seem to us to have been fully considered by the trial court. Perhaps it was not considered because the illegality of the transfer was not specially pleaded in either of the answers; but this was not necessary. The courts, in the due administration of justice, will not enforce a contract in violation of law, or permit a plaintiff to recover upon a transaction against public policy, even if the invalidity of the contract or transaction be not specially pleaded. Oscanyan v. Winchester Repeating Arms Co. 103 U. S. 261, 26 L. ed. 539, and cases cited.

Henry had no hesitation in stating the illegal purpose for which he, in part, transferred the note and mortgage, and cannot complain if this court gives it full effect. Notes and mortgages are subject to taxation in this state. Gen. Stat. 1889, pars. 6846, 6847, 6849; Kansas Mut. L. Assn. v. Hill, 51 Kan. 686.

Cooley, in his work on Taxation, says: "There is not only a necessity for taxation, but it is eminently just and equitable that it should be as nearly equal as possible. Hence it is the policy of the law to require all property, except such as is specially exempted, to bear its proportion of the public burdens." "He who saves a sum of money by evading the payment of a tax does exactly the same injury to society as he who steals so much from the treasury, and is therefore guilty of as great immorality, or as great an act of dishonesty." 1 Sharswood, Bl. Com. p. 58, note; Missouri, R. Ft. S. & G. R. Co. v. Morris, 7 Kan. 210.

Whatever tends to interfere with the beneficial operation of the statute is unlawful, as against the policy of the law. Whatever tends to obstruct duty by defeating the letter or spirit of the law is also unlawful; and the courts will not enforce any agreement or contract for the benefit of one through whose direction or assistance the law is violated, or public policy contravened. The law attempts to close the doors to temptations by refusing such parties recognition in the courts. 37 Cent. L. J. 813.

"No court will lend its aid to a man who founds his cause of action upon an immoral or illegal act. If, from the plaintiff's own stating or otherwise, the cause of action appears to rise ex turpi causa, or the transgression of a positive law of this country, there the court says he has no right to be assisted. It is upon that ground the court goes; not for the sake of the defendant, but because it will not lend its aid to such a plaintiff."

Valentine v. Stewart, 15 Cal. 389; Wilcox v. Ellis, 14 Kan. 588, 19 Am. Rep. 107; Gaston

v. Draks, 14 Nev. 175, 83 Am. Rep. 548; Drexler v. Tyrrell, 15 Nev. 114.

If Simon Pruessner is a bona fide owner and holder of the note for $450 and interest, we think he may be permitted to recover that amount, and have his foreclosure; but, if Henry transferred the note and mortgage to evade the paying of taxes on his interest therein, he cannot be permitted, through Simon Pruessner, to recover any part of the note and mortgage for his own benefit. As before stated, if the note and mortgage had been transferred in good faith as a gift, sale, or as collateral security, without any wrongful intent or purpose on the part of Henry to defraud the revenue laws of the state, the whole amount thereof might be recovered by any owner or holder of the same. But the evidence of Henry, as appearing in the record, unexplained, prevents, in this case, the rendition of the judgment upon the note and mortgage taken by him from the Sheldons, and now attempted to be enforced in the name of his father.

The claim that Joseph L. Sheldon did not own the mortgaged property on the 6th day of June, 1888, at the time of the execution of the note and mortgage, and therefore that there was no consideration given for the $1,700 note, is not tenable. Henry S. Pruessner, and Joseph and Lizzie S. Sheldon exchanged places; the Sheldons conveying by joint deed their homestead in the city of Topeka to Henry S. Pruessner for the 40 acres of land described in the petition, and giving the $1,700 note, secured by the mortgage. Henry S. Pruessner may not have actually delivered the deed to the land to Joseph Sheldon until a day or two after the mortgage to him, but at the time of the execution of the note and mortgage the negotiations for the exchange were completed. The deed to Joseph L. Sheldon is dated the 5th day of June, 1888, and was acknowledged on the 8th day of June, 1888. The mortgage is dated the 6th of June, 1888. It was acknowledged on the 11th day of June, 1888, and recorded on the 14th day of June, 1888. Therefore we suppose all of the papers were exchanged about the same time; that all the conveyances were a part of the same transaction. The note and mortgage were really a part of the purchase money, and the mortgage operates at least upon the estate acquired from Henry, the mortgagee. The only estate attempted to be foreclosed is that obtained from Henry S. Pruessner, and it is not contended that the Sheldons succeeded to any after-acquired title from any one except from Pruessner.

Another contention in the case is that the Motter mortgage of $1,000 was not entitled to be recorded, because it was acknowledged before an interested party, and therefore that Mrs. Sheldon had no constructive or valid notice thereof. The note held by Motter was originally given to J. N. Strickler, cashier, by Henry S. Pruessner and wife, and the mortgage was taken to J. N. Strickler, as cashier. The acknowledgment was taken before L. H. Pounds, notary public. There is nothing upon the face of the mortgage tending to show that Pounds was an interested party. It appears from the evidence, outside of the mortgage, that J. N. Strickler was the cashier of the Investment Banking Company at Topeka, and that T. L. Pounds was the vice-president of that company; not L. H. Pounds, the person taking the acknowledgment. There is no evidence in the record that L. H. Pounds, the notary public, is or was interested in the Investment Banking Company. When the deed of the mortgaged premises was executed by Henry S. Pruessner and wife to Joseph L. Sheldon, the latter accepted the same upon the expressed condition that he assumed the payment of the Motter mortgage; therefore he not only had personal knowledge of the mortgage, but agreed to pay the same to obtain the conveyance of the property. The amount of the prior mortgage was in the nature of purchase money. No property is exempt from the payment of obligations contracted for the purchase thereof. Further than this, it appears from the evidence that Joseph L. Sheldon was absent on business during a part of the negotiations for the exchange of properties, and that his wife, Mrs. Sheldon, had very much to do with the exchange. It is probable that she had actual notice of the Motter mortgage, or rather of the prior incumbrance on the premises received in exchange for her homestead. The note held by Motter was dated February 1, 1888, and matured in three years thereafter. The rate of interest per annum specified in the note was 8 per cent until maturity and 12 per cent after maturity. Where there is an express stipulation that a certain rate of interest shall run after maturity, interest at that rate is recoverable. 11 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, pp. 416, 417, and cases cited in note; 8 Randolph, Com. Paper, p. 823. § 1718, and cases cited; Ansel v. Olson, 39 Kan. 767.

The judgment of the trial court as rendered and entered of record is erroneous as a whole, because the judgment includes not only the amount of the note and mortgage given by the Sheldons to Henry S. Pruessner, but also provides that all of the costs, including the costs in the litigation over the Pruessner note and mortgage, as well as the Motter mortgage, are to be first paid from the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises. The order of sale also contains this erroneous feature. As the costs were improperly adjudged against the Sheldons upon the Pruessner note and mortgage, those costs ought not to have been included in the judgment or the order of sale. Under these circumstances, the judgment will be set aside, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

OREGON & CALIFORNIA R. CO. et al.,
Respts.,
v.

City of PORTLAND, Substituted, etc., Appt.

(.....Or.....)

1. The courts may enjoin the collection of an assessment of abutting owners for the construction of elevated roadways which will not at all benefit the property assessed as there is no foundation for the exercise of discretion of the assessing officers.

2. The enforcement of an assessment for local improvements upon property not at all benefited thereby is the taking of property without due process of law.

(January 15, 1894.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County in favor of plaintiffs in a suit brought to enjoin defendants from collecting an assessment upon complainants' property to pay for the construction of certain elevated roadways. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. J. V. Beach and McGinn, Sears & Simon, for appellants:

The referee having found all the issues in favor of defendants, except upon the question of benefits and upon the sufficiency of the notice of intention to improve, and plaintiffs having moved to confirm said report without objecting to any of said findings, they are precluded from raising any points in this court, except upon the question of benefits and the sufficiency of the notice.

State v. Grover, 10 Or. 66.

The legislature has prescribed what is known as the frontage rule in making assessments to pay for the improvement of streets, granting to the council however the right to reduce the assessment if it determines that the abutting property would not be benefited in the full cost of making such improvement; the council not only did not determine that the abutting property would not be benefited in an amount equal to the cost of the improvement in front of it, but expressly determined and enacted in the ordinances providing for these improvements, which are in evidence in this case, that said property would be benefited in the full cost of making the improvement in front of it, so that both the legislature and the common council have passed upon the question, and their decision in the matter is conclusive, unless the physical condition of the property is such as to render it impossible for it to derive benefit from the improvement.

Poulsen v. Portland, 1 L. R. A. 678, 16 Or. 456; Cooley, Taxn. 661 et seq.; Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 801, and cases there cited.

The finding of the referee on this point is to the effect that the improvement is of no benefit to the property as long as it is used for the purpose for which it was purchased, viz.: making up trains, switching and the like; but can an abutting owner relieve himself from an assessment of this kind by testifying that he purchased the property for a particular use, and that the improvement is no advantage to him or to the property so long as he makes such use of the property? A statement of such a proposition of law is enough to refute it.

See Cooley, Taxn. pp. 668, 664; Elliott, Roads and Streets, pp. 408-441.

The referee has found that these streets do not extend any farther west than Water street, the land west of these points being tide or overflowed lands.

If there are no streets there, no property can be assessed for the improvement; but what right have plaintiffs to complain?

If complainants owned the adjoining property they could not prevail in this suit upon the ground that there was no street laid out there, without tendering the amount of the assessment upon the remaining portion of their property.

Mr. A. H. Tanner, for respondents:

The power conferred upon municipal corporations to improve streets and assess the cost thereof upon adjacent property is a special and limited power, and can only be exercised by a strict observance of every requirement of the act conferring it.

The notices of the intention of the common council of the city of East Portland to make these improvements are void, for the reason that they do not describe with the requisite certainty the streets or part thereof to be improved.

Where property is shown to be so situated with reference to the improvement that there cannot possibly be any actual or present benefit thereto, the finding and declaration of the council that the property is benefited is a legal fraud upon the property owner, which courts of equity will set aside as oppressive and in violation of the constitutional rights of such owner.

Property acquired under legislative authority and held for railroad purposes exclusively, including road-bed, right of way, depots and station grounds, are held for public use, and are treated by the law on grounds of public policy as an entire thing, not legally subject to coercive severance or dislocation, except by some act of the legislature expressly authorizing it. Hence, such property is not subject to assessment for local improvements resulting in a specific lien upon specific parts or portions of such property, and the consequent sale thereof in the same manner as upon execution, as provided by the city charter of East Portland, unless expressly authorized by legislative enactment.

Buncombe County Comrs. v. Tommey, 115 U. S. 122, 29 L. ed. 305; 2 Jones, Liens, §§ 1618, 1619.

Assessments made upon the property of the plaintiffs as to the benefits received, without notice and an opportunity to be heard upon that question, if deemed final and conclusive, would be unconstitutional as depriving them of property "without due process of law."

But if the matter of assessments of benefits is left subject to review by the courts, and the decision of the council is not deemed to be final and conclusive, then it is submitted that the property owner is not denied the right to be heard in reference to the assessment of such benefits, and the constitutional guarantee referred to is not violated.

The elevated roadways in question were extended from one hundred and fifty to two hundred feet west of the west end of the streets, and jutting out for a considerable distance into the Willamette river, which was unauthorized, and renders the whole proceeding void.

Dyer v. Chase, 53 Cal. 441; Welty, Assessments, § 286; Western Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Allegheny, 92 Pa. 100.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit originally brought against the city of East Portland, its officers and employes, to restrain it and them from building elevated roadways on G and H streets, adjoining plaintiffs' property, and to enjoin the collection of the assessment therefor. A temporary injunction was granted, restraining the construction of the roadways and the collection of the assessment, which was subsequently modified by permitting the defendants to build the roadways upon giving a sufficient bond conditioned that said structures would be removed if it should be decreed that they were improperly built, or that the proceedings of the city council were insufficient to authorize their construction. After the consolidation of East Portland and Portland, the latter city was, by order of the court, substituted for the other defendants. The plaintiffs protested against the improvements when they were contemplated by the council, and, as soon as they were commenced, began this suit; but the defendants gave the required bond, and proceeded with the work. The complaint sets out the alleged errors of the city council which it is claimed rendered its proceedings void, and, the defendants having deemed all its material allegations, the cause was referred to H. H. Northup, Esq., to take the testimony, and report his findings of fact and conclusions of law thereon. The referee, after taking the testimony, made, among others, the following finding of fact: "(2) The said improvements of G and H streets are of no benefit to the property of the plaintiffs, described in finding of fact No. 6, in its present condition, nor are said improvements of any benefit to said property when used for the purposes for which it was purchased and intended, to wit, yard and depot purposes." The court, at the trial, approved said finding, and rendered a decree perpetually enjoining the collection of the assessment, from which the defendants appeal, and now contend that the assessment of benefits was a matter within the discretion of the city council, which the courts cannot review.

The streets of a city having been dedicated by the proprietor to the public, the state, by its legislative assembly, may determine the necessity for, and character of, any improvement thereto, and what property will be benefited thereby; and whatever power the legislature possesses over the streets of a city it may delegate to its corporate authorities, to be exercised in the mode, and to the extent, prescribed in the act conferring such power. This delegation of power invests the municipal corporation with all the discretion the legislature possessed, and hence it follows that the common council, as agent of the corporation, is clothed with exclusive discretion in determining the necessity for and character of all street improvements, what property will be benefited thereby, and the amount of benefits conferred. These are questions of policy with which the legislature and its creature, the municipal corporation, deal, and the courts have no right to interfere except in case of fraud or oppression, or some wrong constituting a plain abuse of such discretion. Elliott, Roads & Streets, 375; Cooley, Taxn. 661.

It is impossible for a council to fix with mathematical accuracy the amount of benefits that will inure to property in consequence of a local improvement, but if it appear that it has exercised an honest discretion in determining this question of policy, however much it may have erred in judgment, the remedy is at the polls in choosing a new council, and not by reviewing its proceedings in the courts. If the courts were invested with authority to review these questions of policy, but few assessments could ever be collected without an action, and the adjudication of purely legislative questions would be substituted for the discretion of a city council. The only recognized exceptions to this rule are to be found in those cases in which, under pretense of apportionment, a work of general benefit has been treated as one of merely local consequence, and the cost imposed on some local community in disregard of the general rules which control legislation in matters of taxation. Cooley, Taxn. 405.

The presumption is that the council has done its duty; but this presumption may be overcome by facts showing that the rule prescribed for the apportionment or the assessment made under it is so grossly and palpably unjust and oppressive as to give demonstration that the proper authority had never determined the case on the principle of taxation. Cooley, Taxn. 662; Elliott, Roads & Streets, 410.

Section 5, article 6, of the charter of East Portland (Sess. Laws 1885, p. 316), under which the assessment was made, provides that "the council may proceed to ascertain and determine the probable cost of making such improvement, and assess upon each lot or part thereof liable therefor its proportionate share of such cost, and if the council shall adjudge that any such lot or part of lot would not be benefited by the improvement in the full sum of the cost of making the same upon the half of the street abutting upon such lot or part of lot, the council shall assess upon such lot or part of lot, as its proportionate share thereof, such sum only as it shall find the lot to be benefited by such improvement." And section 18 of the same article provides that "each lot or part thereof, within the limits of a proposed street improvement, shall be liable for the full cost of making the same upon the half of the street in front of and abutting upon it, and also a proportionate share of the cost of improving the intersection of two of the streets bounding the block in which said lot or part thereof is situated, unless the council shall have determined that such lot or part thereof will not be benefited by such improvement in the full sum of such cost, in which case such lot or part thereof shall be liable for so much of said cost only as the council shall have found the same to be benefited thereby; and the further cost of making said improvement in excess of the benefits so found shall be paid from the general fund of the city."

These sections of the charter clearly provide that the measure of the assessment is limited to the amount of benefits derived, and invest the council with a discretion in determining that amount; and, so long as this discretion is not abused, the courts are powerless to review its action in a collateral proceeding. Thayer, J., in speaking of the discretion of a common council in assessing benefits, said: "It exercises such authority as agent of the state, and for the public good; and, so long as it keeps within the scope of its power, the courts have no control over it, nor jurisdiction in a collateral proceeding to question its acts. If it were to assess property for the cost of constructing a sewer, so laid as to render it physically impossible to benefit the property, as in the case of Hanscom v. Omaha, 11 Neb. 87, it would exceed its authority, and it would be the duty of the courts to interfere, and prevent the wrong from working injury; but where the property is directly benefited by the prosecution of such an enterprise, and the common council has assessed what it deems a proportionate share of the cost upon the owner thereof, the courts are not authorized to institute an inquiry in order to ascertain whether or not the assessment exceeds the benefits." Paulson v. Portland, 16 Or. 450, 1 L. R. A. 673. This is practically holding that, if property had received any benefit from a local improvement, courts would not measure the amount, but, if it were so situated that it could not possibly receive any benefit therefrom, they would interfere to prevent the wrong.

The referee who took the testimony found that the property was so situated that it had received no benefit from the improvement, and the court gave this finding its unqualified approval in the following expressive language: "The evidence shows that these elevated roadways led from Second street to the river, where there is no wharf, warehouse, ferry, or landing, or other improvements; that it has not been traveled or used as a thoroughfare, or in fact for any purpose except for the storage of iron and materials; that there is no likelihood that it will ever be used as a traveled street; that it has not served any other cognate purpose; that it is an actual detriment to the property of the plaintiffs for the purpose for which it was purchased, to wit, yard and depot purposes. It appears, also, in the ninth and tenth findings of fact of the referee's report, that the city built these elevated roadways beyond the west end of the streets over private property,—ninety-five feet from the west end of G street, and one hundred and thirty-nine feet from the west end of H street,—and attempted to assess the costs upon the plaintiffs' property. The alleged improvements would appear to be a foolish and wholly uncalled for undertaking, which served neither the public nor the property holders in this instance; and the attempt to charge the property of the plaintiffs with the costs thereof is, to use the words of a famous jurist in a similar instance, 'so plainly, palpably, rankly, and ruinously unjust that it must be pronounced no proper or lawful mode of taxation, but an injustice so gross as to be void against the rights of property, as protected by a bill of rights.'"

The court and referee, from their knowledge of the premises and of the character of the improvement, were well qualified to make these findings, which a careful examination of the record shows were fully warranted by the evidence.

"The courts," says Judge Elliott, "will interfere with reluctance, and only in clear cases, but they will not abdicate all power of review and supervision. They will not substitute their judgment for that of the local officers, but they will not permit those officers to so abuse their discretion as to do great injustice to the citizen." Elliott, Roads & Streets, 411.

"We have no doubt," said the court in Allen v. Drew, 44 Vt. 174, "that a local assessment may so far transcend the limits of equality and reason that its exaction would cease to be a tax, or contribution to a common burden, and become extortion and confiscation. In that case it would be the duty of the court to protect the citizen from robbery under color of a better name."

The court having found that there was no necessity for the improvement, that the elevated roadway, as built, had not been, and probably never would be, used, and that the improvements were of no benefit, but an actual damage, to plaintiffs' property, and these conclusions being amply supported by the evidence, we feel bound thereby. The record shows that these roadways are from 15 to 30 feet above the surface of plaintiffs' property, extending from Second street, on G and H streets, into the Willamette river, a distance of about three blocks, and can only be approached from Second street; that they do not connect with any wharf, bridge, ferry, or landing, and, as the court substantially finds, stand out in the river as monuments of folly; that, though they have been built about two years in a populous city, teeming with life and business energy, they have only been used in a few instances by teamsters hauling away some iron pipes which had been landed thereon from the river. There could not have been much, if any, public necessity for these structures, if their actual use is to be taken as an indication of their utility. They have not been used by the public nor by the plaintiffs, and, as the court finds, probably never will be; and yet it is sought to collect the cost of their construction from the plaintiffs upon the theory of benefits conferred. Courts rightfully hesitate to review the discretion of a city council, and consider it a delicate question; and yet there are cases in which the exercise of the power of assessment becomes such a flagrant abuse that they must interfere to prevent the confiscation of property. In this case it clearly appears that the property of the plaintiffs was in no way benefited by the alleged improvement, and hence there was no foundation for the exercise of discretion on the part of the council in the assessment of such property for its cost, or any part thereof. Under such circumstances, the enforcement of the assessment would be "taking property without due process of law," and the decree must therefore be affirmed.

RHODE ISLAND SUPREME COURT.

Re LEGISLATIVE ADJOURNMENT.

(28 R. L. —)

1. A resolution purporting to be passed by the house of representatives after the

2. The provision in Const., art. 4, § 9, that neither house, without consent of the other, shall adjourn for more than two days is subject to implied exceptions, such several interesting questions, which are decided in the above case for the first time.

The case which comes nearest to constituting a as that where one house has unlawfully unseated members, thereby depriving towns of their constitutional representation. In such case the other house may adjourn until the vacancies can be filled.

3. The question whether or not a "disagreement" exists which authorizes the governor to adjourn the general assembly, under Const., art. 7, § 6, is one on which the decision of the governor is conclusive, and not reviewable by the courts.

4. The fact that the two houses have not yet joined in grand committee for counting and declaring votes does not prevent the governor, under Const., art. 7, § 6, from adjourning the general assembly in case of disagreement between the two houses.

(August 12, 1893.)

ON REQUEST by the House of Representatives for the opinion of the supreme court as to the validity of an adjournment by the senate. Adjournment sustained.

The assembly met pursuant to the constitution on May 30, 1893. After organization the house of representatives sent an invitation to the senate to join in grand committee to canvass the votes for general officers, and to elect such officers as had not been elected by the people. The senate declined this invitation because "since the organization of the house, that body, to the knowledge of the members of the senate, had unseated certain of its members and seated persons not elected, in violation of law and in defiance of the constitution of the state, thereby changing the character of the grand committee and that therefore the house, as at present constituted, is not the body with which the constitution contemplates that the senate should meet for the purpose named in the resolution;" thereupon the senate voted to adjourn to meet again on the last Tuesday in January, 1894, and transmitted the vote to the house for concurrence. The house refused to concur, and the senate then passed a resolution to adjourn to the time named, claiming the right to do so because of irreconcilable differences between it and the house as to the time and place of adjournment. It also certified to the governor a disagreement, and the governor thereby adjourned the general assembly to meet at the time and place stated in the senate resolution.

The house of representatives then adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, that the honorable judges of the supreme court be, and are hereby, requested to give to the house of representatives their opinion upon the following questions of law:

"First. Has the senate the constitutional power at the May session to pass a resolution of adjournment for a longer period than two days, until after it has joined with the house of representatives in grand committee, request having been made to the senate by the precedent is that of People v. Hatch, 33 Ill. 2, in which the court regretted its inability to find any similar case, and held that a valid adjournment must be held to have been made when the governor's proclamation of an adjournment had been acquiesced in by both houses of the legislature by dispersing. It also held that a joint rule for adjournment sine die by resolution, not being a constitutional requirement, was not indispensable to such adjournment; and that where the legislature disperses without meeting again on the following day, and the journals show no adjournment to any particular day, it must be presumed that the adjournment was sine die. This decision was rendered under a constitutional provision substantially identical with that of Rhode Island in respect to the power of the governor to adjourn the legislature.

The Illinois case is the only one we have been able to find which really touches the question of power to adjourn the legislature, except that of Trammell v. Bradley, 37 Ark. 374, which only decides that a concurrent resolution to continue a session of the legislature for ten days after the time when the session would otherwise expire is one of the "questions of adjournment," which, under Ark. Const., art. 6, § 16, are excepted from those orders or resolutions which must be presented to the governor.

In Story on the Constitution, § 844, it is said in respect to the adjournment of legislative bodies by the executive "under the colonial governments, the undue exercise of the same power by the royal governors constituted a great public grievance and was one of the numerous cases of misrule upon which the Declaration of Independence strenuously relied."

It is not strange therefore that the constitutions of nearly all the states have incorporated provisions to govern legislative adjournments. In a large number of states it is provided, in substantially the same language, that neither house can adjourn for more than three days without the consent of the other. Ala. Const. (1875) art. 4, § 16; Ariz. Rev. Stat. § 2397; Ark. Const. (1874) art. 5, § 23; Cal. Const. (1849) art. 4, § 15; Colo. Const. (1876) art. 5, § 15; Del. Const. (1831) art. 2, § 10; Fla. Const. (1885) art. 3, § 13; Ga. Const. (1877) art. 3, § 7, subd. 24; Ind. Const. (1851) art. 4, § 10; Iowa Const. (1857) art. 3, § 14; Ky. Const. (1850) art. 2, § 23; La. Const. (1860) art. 33; Md. Const. (1867) art. 3, § 25; Mich. Const. (1850) art. 4, § 12; Minn. Const. (1857) art. 4, § 6; Miss. Const. (1869) art. 4, § 13; Neb. Const. (1875) art. 3, § 8; Nev. Const. (1864) art. 4, § 15; N. J. Const. (1844) art. 4, § 4, subd. 6; Or. Const. (1859) art. 4, § 11; Pa. Const. (1790) art. 1, § 16; S. C. Const. (1862) art. 2, § 25; Tenn. Const. (1870) art. 2, § 16; Tex. Const. (1845) art. 3, § 19; Vt. Amend. 3 (1836) to Const. of 1793; Va. Const. (1869) art. 5, § 6; W. Va. Const. (1872) art. 6, § 23; Wis. Const. (1848) art. 4, § 10.

In a few states it is provided that such adjournment by either house without the consent of the other shall be for not more than two days. Ill. Const. (1870) art. 4, § 10; Kan. Const. (1859) art. 2, § 10; Me. Const. art. 4, pt. 3, § 12; Mo. Const. (1875) art. 4, § 23; N. Y. Const. (1875) art. 3, § 11; Ohio Const. (1861) art. 2, § 14; R. I. Const. (1842) art. 4, § 9.

But in Kansas, Minnesota, and Ohio Sundays are expressly excepted from the days limited.

In Massachusetts and New Hampshire the provisions are separately made in respect to the senate and house of representatives. They declare affirmatively that the senate may adjourn themselves provided the adjournment shall not exceed two days at a time. Mass. Const. (1780) pt. 2, art. 6, § 2; N. H. Const. (1793) pt. 2, art. 35. And the same provision is made as to adjournment of the house of representatives. Mass. Const. pt. 2, chap. 1, § 3, art. 8; N. H. Const. pt. 2, art. 18. But nothing is said expressly in either case about the consent of the other house; or of a longer adjournment with such consent.

In respect to the senate it is also provided by N. H. Const. (1793) pt. 2, art. 35, that on an impeachhouse of representatives to join in such grand committee for the purpose of counting and declaring the votes cast for general officers at the preceding April election?

"Second. In case a resolution of adjournment to the city of Providence to the fourth Tuesday in January following should have been adopted by the senate before joining the house of representatives in grand committee at the annual May session, for the purpose of counting and declaring the votes cast for general officers at the preceding general election, should not have been acted upon by the house of representatives, does such a state of things constitute a 'disagreement' on the subject of adjournment, which confers upon the governor the power to adjourn the general assembly, under section 6, article 7, of the Constitution?"

"Third. Can the general assembly at the May session be adjourned by the governor under the power conferred upon him by section 6, article 7, of the Constitution, until after the two houses have joined in grand committee for the purpose of counting and declaring the votes cast for general officers at the preceding April election?"

This resolution was indorsed: "In House of Representatives, June 2, 1893. Read and passed. John E. Conley, Clerk."—and was transmitted by the speaker of the house to the court.

The court returned the following opinion:

ment trial it may adjourn as it thinks proper, although the legislature be not assembled on such day nor at such place.

In nearly but not quite all the above-named states the provision limiting the number of days for which either house to adjourn without consent of the other is connected with a provision that it shall not adjourn to any other place without such consent. Ala. Const. (1875) art. 4, § 16; Ariz. Rev. Stat. § 2297; Ark. (1874) art. 5, § 22; Cal. Const. (1849) art. 4, § 15; Colo. Const. (1876) art. 5, § 15; Del. Const. (1831) art. 2, § 10; Fla. Const. (1885) art. 3, § 13; Ga. Const. (1877) art. 3, § 7, subd. 24; Ill. Const. (1870) art. 4, § 10; Ind. Const. (1851) art. 4, § 10; Iowa Const. (1857) art. 3, § 14; Ky. Const. (1850) art. 2, § 22; La. Const. (1850) art. 33; Me. Const. (1819) art. 4, pt. 3, § 12; Mich. Const. (1850) art. 4, § 12; Minn. Const. (1857) art. 4, § 6; Miss. Const. (1869) art. 4, § 12; N. J. Const. (1844) art. 4, § 4, subd. 5; Ohio Const. (1851) art. 3, § 9; Or. Const. (1859) art. 4, § 11; R. I. Const. (1842) art. 4, § 9; S. C. Const. (1882) art. 2, § 25; Tenn. Const. (1870) art. 2, § 16; Vt. Amend. 3 (1836) to Const. 1793; Va. (1880) art. 5, § 6; W. Va. (1872) art. 6, § 23.

In Maryland it is provided that such adjournment shall not be made to another place without a concurrent vote of two thirds present. Md. Const. (1867) art. 3, § 25.

In Missouri it is provided that if the general assembly take an adjournment or recess for more than three days, it shall have the effect of and be an adjournment sine die (Mo. Const. (1875) art. 4, § 21); but an adjournment of three days or less shall not interrupt the session. Section 22.

A large number of states, though not quite so many as are above mentioned, also provide in their constitution that the governor may adjourn the legislature in case of disagreement. Such is the provision in Ga. Const. (1877) art. 3, § 7, subd. 24. The greater number of these, like Rhode Island, provide that in such case the adjournment shall be for such time as the governor shall think proper, provided it shall not be for a time which shall ex-

To the Honorable Franklin P. Owen, Speaker of the House of Representatives:

We have received from you a resolution, purporting to have been passed by the house of representatives, propounding certain questions of law upon which we are requested to give our opinion.

Before proceeding to specifically consider said questions, we feel called upon to say that, from the character and tenor thereof, we must infer that, prior to the passage of the resolution submitting said question to us, the general assembly had been prorogued by his excellency, the governor.

This being so, and assuming, as we are bound to do, that the said act of the governor was legal, said resolution was not passed by the house of representatives, and we are not, therefore, called upon to take notice of the same. See article 10, § 3, of the Constitution. The gravity of the situation, however, in which both the legislative and executive branches of our state government are at present placed, of which we cannot fail to take notice, and the importance of the principles and rights involved, are a sufficient warrant, we think, for us to assume the right and duty of replying to said questions.

In doing so we have the honor to say:

First. That under the provisions of article 4, § 9, of the Constitution, neither house has the power, without the consent of the other, to adjourn for more than two days, nor to tend beyond the time for the beginning of the next regular session. Ark. Const. (1874) art. 5, § 20; Cal. Const. (1849) art. 5, § 11; Colo. Const. (1876) art. 4, § 10; Conn. Const. (1818) art. 4, § 7; Ill. Const. (1870) art. 5, § 9; Miss. Const. (1869) art. 5, § 7; Fla. Const. (1885) art. 4, § 10; Iowa Const. (1857) art. 4, § 13; Kan. Const. (1859) art. 1, § 6; Me. Const. (1819) art. 5, pt. 1, § 13; Neb. Const. (1875) art. 5, § 9; Nev. Const. (1864) art. 5, § 11; R. I. Const. (1842) art. 7, § 6; S. C. Const. (1882) art. 3, § 16; Tex. Const. (1845) art. 5, § 8.

In Colorado the governor's authority can be exercised only when the fact of disagreement is certified by the house which has last moved for an adjournment. Colo. Const. (1876) art. 4, § 10.

In two states such adjournment by the governor cannot be for more than ninety days, and his authority must be exercised under the advice of his counsel. Mass. Const. (1790) pt. 2, chap. 2, § 1, art. 6; N. H. Const. (1793 and Amends.) pt. 2, art. 42.

In New Hampshire it is further provided that the governor shall dissolve the same seven days before the first Wednesday in January.

In Delaware the limit of adjournment by the governor in case of such disagreement is three months. Del. Const. (1831) art. 3, § 12.

In Kentucky and Pennsylvania the governor may make such adjournment in case of disagreement for not more than four months. Ky. Const. (1850) art. 3, § 12; Pa. Const. (1790) art. 3, § 12.

While in Vermont the provision is that, in such case, he may adjourn the legislature to such time as he thinks proper. Vt. Const. Amend. 3 (1836) to Const. of 1793.

And this would seem to be the effect of Ga. Const. (1877) art. 3, § 7, subd. 24, which does not expressly limit the time for adjournment.

Many states also have constitutional provisions for adjournment of a legislative house from day to day for lack of a quorum but this is matter quite different from permanent adjournment.

B. A. R.

any other place than that in which they may be sitting. A condition of things can be imagined, however, which would warrant an adjournment in the circumstances stated in the questions. For example, suppose the house of representatives should unseat or expel thirty-five members, leaving only a bare quorum, and several towns unrepresented; the constitution clearly implies that the representation of all the towns shall be complete, even though all the members-elect may not attend the session. This implication is found in the fact that members of the preceding body may hold their seats until their successors are qualified to act; and in the further provision of article 8, § 7, that where a failure to elect a governor is produced by rejecting the entire vote of any town, city, or ward, a new election shall be ordered. The idea is plain that each town shall be entitled to its full representation and vote, both in an election by the people, or, in case of failure, by the assembly. If, therefore, either house should, by its own action, deprive towns of representation to the extent supposed, we do not think it could be claimed that the other house is bound to go into grand committee with a house so constituted. The supposed case is an extreme one, but it illustrates the principle that each town is entitled to the full representation which the constitution contemplates, and this principle is equally violated, though not to the same extent, if one town is illegally deprived of its full representation. In such cases the assembly may properly adjourn until the vacancies can be filled.

Other emergent causes, sufficient to justify an adjournment, may arise, such as an epidemic, after the assembly has convened; a riot, or great public disturbance; the destruction of the statehouse; a palpable violation of the constitution by the expulsion of members contrary to its provisions, whereby the character of the grand committee is changed, and the like. In the latter case, notwithstanding the fact that each house is to be the judge of the qualifications of its own members, a decent self-respect would entitle the other branch to refuse to be a party to such illegal constitution of the grand committee, and to base its action thereon. The question then resolves itself into this: Whether the assembly, by joint resolution, may adjourn for more than two days after both houses are organized, and before counting the votes; for what both bodies may pass by concurrent vote, one may first pass and transmit to the other for concurrence. We regard the provision of the constitution requiring the assembly to count the votes at the May session as in the highest degree imperative. Yet, as we have said, there may be circumstances which would justify, and, indeed, require, the postponement of this duty for more than two days. Hence, as an abstract proposition, we must answer the question in the affirmative. Whether any given state of affairs is one to justify or demand such adjournment, and how long such adjournment should be, are legislative questions, necessarily left to the decision of the body whose action is proposed, and when decided by such body can 22 L. R. A.

only be reviewed by the approval or rebuke of the electors.

Second. In reply to the second question, we have to say that whether or not the circumstances stated therein constitute such a "disagreement" as is contemplated under the provision of article 7, § 6,* of the Constitution, is a question which it is not within either the province or power of the judiciary to determine, but which, under the constitution, rests solely in the sound judgment and discretion of the chief executive of the state. Whatever our personal opinions might be as to the propriety of certifying a disagreement under the circumstances stated, an expression of such opinion, after the act is done, with no power to correct it, would amount only to a criticism upon the action of a co-ordinate branch of the government, which it would be improper to make; for it must be constantly borne in mind that the powers of our government are distributed into three departments,—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial,—all co-ordinate and of equal authority in their proper spheres, though mutually interwoven, and, in some measure, dependent upon each other. As said by the great expounder of constitutional law: "A separation of departments, so far as practicable, and the preservation of clear lines of division between them, is the fundamental idea in the creation of all our constitutions; and, doubtless, the continuance of regulated liberty depends on maintaining these boundaries." 4 Webster, Works, p. 122. See also Works of Rufus Choate, by Samuel Gilman Brown, p. 364.

The powers vested in the executive department are to be exercised by the governor under his oath of office, and under the express constitutional injunction that he "shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed;" and he is responsible to the people alone for the manner in which he discharges the duties of his high office. If he violates the constitution or the laws which he is sworn to support, he may be impeached, and removed from office, and may also be indicted and punished like any other person. See article 2, Const. But for the exercise of his powers and prerogatives as governor, neither the legislative nor the judicial department of the government has any power to call him to account, nor can they, or either of them, review his action in connection therewith. In short, it cannot be questioned that the governor is supreme and independent in the executive department, as is the legislature in the legislative, and the court in the judicial, department of the government. People v. Mahaney, 13 Mich. 481; People v. The Governor, 29 Mich. 320, 18 Am. Rep. 89; Hovey v. State, 127 Ind. 588-600, 11 L. R. A. 763.

Moreover, this is a case in which the executive department of the state government has the power and duty to finally pass upon a question of constitutional construction. It belongs to that class of cases, as well stated by Judge Cooley in his excellent work on Constitutional Limitations (p. 54), "where, by the constitution, a particular question is plainly addressed to the discretion or judgment of some one department or officer: so that the interference of any other department or officer, with a view to the substitution of its own discretion or judgment in the place of that to which the constitution has confided the decision, would be impertinent and intrusive." "Under every constitution," says the same learned author, "cases of this description are to be met with, and, though it will sometimes be found difficult to classify them, there can be no doubt, when the case is properly determined to be one of this character, that the rule must prevail which makes the decision final."

*Sec. 6. In case of disagreement between the two houses of the general assembly, respecting the time or place of adjournment, certified to him by either, he (the governor) may adjourn them to such time and place as he shall think proper: provided that the time of adjournment shall not be extended beyond the day of the next stated session."

The power of the executive which we are considering is a political power, "in the exercise of which," in the language of Chief Justice Marshall in Marbury v. Madison, 5 U. S. 1 Cranch, 137, 2 L. ed. 60, "he is to use his own discretion, and is accountable only to his country in his political character, and to his own conscience; and, whatever opinion may be entertained of the manner in which the executive discretion may be used, still there exists no power to control that discretion." "The subject is political." "It respects the state, not individual rights; and, being intrusted to the executive, the decision of the executive is conclusive." See also, People v. Brooks, 16 Cal. 11, 54 et seq.; United States v. Arredondo, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 691, 729, 780, 8 L. ed. 547, 561, and cases cited; Hawkins v. The Governor, 1 Ark. 570, 586-596, 33 Am. Dec. 846.

In Mauran v. Smith, 8 R. I. 192-228, 5 Am. Rep. 564, which was a petition for a writ of mandamus to compel the governor to prefer charges against, and convene a court-martial for the trial of, the petitioner, the general question here involved was very fully and ably discussed by eminent counsel, and it was held by this court, Durfee, J., giving the opinion, that the court had no authority to grant the writ, for the reason that the governor, while acting within the sphere of his authority, constituted an independent co-ordinate department of the government. See also, Taylor v. Place, 4 R. I. 324, 330-364.

We can no better define and illustrate the power and duty of the judiciary in the premises, than by quoting from the able opinion of Caton, Ch. J., in People v. Bissell, 19 Ill. 229, 231, 68 Am. Dec. 591. He says: "To the judiciary is confided the power and the duty of interpreting the laws and the constitution whenever they are judicially presented for consideration. Hence it becomes our duty to determine what is the meaning of the laws passed by the legislature, and also whether those laws are such as the legislature was authorized by the constitution to pass. So also, of the acts of the executive, we are bound to determine whether such acts are authorized by the laws and the constitution, whenever they are brought before us judicially, but not otherwise; and hence the judicial department of the government exercises a certain controlling, or rather restraining, power, over both the other departments 32 L. R. A.

of the government. Notwithstanding all this, when carefully considered, it will be seen that each department, within its proper constitutional sphere, acts independently of both the others, and restraint is only placed upon it when such sphere is actually transcended, or express authority is given by the constitution, for restraint or control, by another department. As from necessity and the very nature of all government there must be an ultimatum somewhere, whose duty it is to determine whether such sphere has been passed or not, that duty in most cases falls on the judicial department, from the fact that in this department is reposed the responsibility of enforcing or giving effect to the acts of the other departments; but it is only when thus called upon, in some form known to the law, to give effect to such acts of the other departments, that the judiciary can determine whether such acts were done in the exercise of a constitutional power. In no other way, nor in any other cases, can this department construe the constitution for, or exercise any control over, any other department. Where final action upon any subject is confided to either of the other departments, there the responsibility must rest of conforming such action to the law and the constitution. "It is because such final action is generally devolved upon the judiciary that the judiciary is most frequently called upon to give a final and conclusive construction to the constitution and laws. It results, therefore, from this philosophical arrangement of our governmental system, that the control which the judicial department exercises over the others is of a restraining, and not of a compulsory, power. But this is only practically, and not literally, so. We may not enjoin the others from doing an unconstitutional act, but by refusing to give effect to such act, or relieving against it, when properly and judicially applied to for that purpose, we may restrain them. We cannot restrain the governor from issuing the bonds of the state, contrary to law; but when the question is properly presented before us we can declare such bonds void; and so of a patent for the public land which he might issue. And so, if he should step beyond his constitutional sphere, and unlawfully imprison a party, we could discharge such party on habeas corpus. But we have no power to compel either of the other departments of the government to perform any duty which the constitution or the law may impose upon them, no matter how palpable such duty may be, any more than either of those departments may compel us to perform our duties. The governor is, and must be, as independent of us as is the legislature, or as we are of either of them."

Third. As to the third and last question submitted to us, we have to say that, under article 7, § 6, of the Constitution, above referred to, the power of the governor to adjourn the general assembly upon the happening of the event therein mentioned is general, and not dependent upon the fact as to whether the two houses have joined in grand committee or not. The exigency provided for by the constitution had arisen. The necessary and only warrant required for action on his part was the certificate of disagreement. It is true, he was not bound to act on that certificate. The records of both houses are public, and the executive is as fully entitled to take notice of them as the judiciary. He may go behind the certificate, and determine by an inspection of the records of the two houses whether, in fact, the disagreement exists as certified; and even if the record of one house should not disclose that it had acted, nonaction is sometimes equivalent to adverse action, and may be so treated by the executive in determining whether a disagreement exists, which calls for the exercise of his constitutional prerogative.

The argument as to jurisdiction implies a power of review by the judiciary; but this question being left by the constitution entirely in the hands of the legislature and the executive, we think we are bound to consider action taken as an accomplished fact. It is like the judgment of a court of general jurisdiction, which is final and conclusive. Whenever, therefore, there shall be a disagreement between the two houses as to the time or place of adjournment certified to the governor by either,—and, as before stated, he is the sole judge as to the fact of the existence of such disagreement upon such certification to him,—we think he has the constitutional power to adjourn them under said section 6 of the Constitution. The state of the business pending before the assembly would doubtless be taken into account both by the house taking the initiative in the matter of the adjournment, and also by the governor in declaring that the exigency provided for in said section had arisen; but we do not think the power granted therein would be affected thereby. Nor, it appearing of record that by reason of the certification aforesaid he had jurisdiction in the premises, have we any authority to inquire into the facts upon which the governor based his said action; for, as said by Judge Story in Martin v. Mott, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 19, 31, 6 L. ed. 587, 541: "Whenever a statute gives a discretionary power to any person, to be exercised by him upon his own opinion of certain facts, it is a sound rule of construction that the statute constitutes him the sole and exclusive judge of the existence of those facts." We therefore answer said third and last question in the affirmative.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

John W. JUDEFIND, Ptff. in Err.,

v.

STATE of Maryland.

(.....Md.....)

1. No writ of error lies to the court of appeals of Maryland from a decision of the circuit court on an appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace.

2. A statute prohibiting labor on Sunday is not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States or of Maryland.

3. A constitutional guaranty of religious liberty is not violated by a statute prohibiting Sunday labor.

NOTE.—The constitutionality of Sunday laws.

The case of JUDEFIND v. STATE, above reported, and the case of PEOPLE v. BELLER, ante, 696, revive the question of the constitutionality of Sunday laws, which has been settled so far as decision can settle it by overwhelming authority.

The decision of a recorder at nisi prius in an early South Carolina case held a Sunday closing ordinance unconstitutional as to a Jew, but this decision was reversed on appeal, deciding that it was a mere police regulation which did not interfere with the exercise of religious privileges. Charleston v. Benjamin, 3 Strobb. L. 508, 49 Am. Dec. 608.

In Ex parte Newman, 9 Cal. 502, a Sunday law prohibiting the sale of goods was held by two of the three judges to be unconstitutional as an unnecessary denial of the right to acquire property, and as violating the constitutional prohibition against discrimination or preferences as to religious profession or worship; but Judge Field, who has since been for many years a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, made a vigorous dissent from the decision, and in Ex parte Andrew, 18 Cal. 378, the decision was expressly overruled, adopting the former dissent of Judge Field.

This later decision upholding the constitutionality of such a statute was followed and fully approved in Ex parte Burke, 59 Cal. 6, which was a case as to the keeping open of a saloon on Sunday.

was followed, upholding a law requiring stores, workshops, and similar places of business to be closed on Sunday, and deciding that it did not violate the constitutional guaranty of freedom of religious profession and worship without discrimination or preference. Three judges, however, dissented from this decision, of whom two attempted to distinguish the case from Andrew's Case on the ground that in the present case the statute attempted to make the observance of Sunday a religious observance as it was in a portion of the statutes headed "crimes against religion and conscience, and other offenses against good morals."

The other cases in which the constitutionality of a statute requiring cessation from business on Sunday has been questioned and discussed have in every instance decided that such statutes are not unconstitutional.

The constitutional provisions as to due process of law, equal privileges and immunities of citizens, right to acquire property, as well as those prohibiting the establishment of religion and guaranteeing freedom of worship, have been among those under which such statutes have been attacked.

While in some cases courts have based their decision in support of Sunday laws on religious grounds, the decisions generally, especially in recent cases, are based on the proposition that a Sunday law is a civil or police regulation.

This is the doctrine held in Bloom v. Richards, 3 Ohio St. 387; McGatrick v. Wason, 4 Ohio St. 562;

(January 23, 1894.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Kent County to review a judgment convicting defendant of working on Sunday, contrary to the provisions of the statute. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James T. Ringgold for plaintiff in error.

Mr. John P. Poe, Atty-Gen., for defendant in error:

No writ of error lies to this court from the final decision of a circuit court, on an appeal to it from the judgment of a justice of the peace.

Rayner v. State, 52 Md. 368; Clark v. Vannort (Md.) Nov. 16, 1893.

Mr. William M. Slay also for defendant in error.

Boyd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error was arrested, under a warrant issued by a justice of the peace for Kent county, for husking corn on Sunday. He was tried, convicted, and fined five dollars and costs, in accordance with the provisions of article 27, § 247, of the Code of Public General Laws. He appealed to the circuit court, where he elected to be tried before the court, and was convicted and fined five dollars and costs by that court. He has brought the case to this court by petition in the nature of a writ of error, in which he designates the following as the points of law to be reviewed: (1) That section 247 of article 27 of the Code is void because it is in violation of the first paragraph of the 14th article of the Constitution of the United

State v. Bott, 31 La. Ann. 663, 33 Am. Rep. 224; State v. Judge of Criminal Dist. Ct. of Orleans, 39 La. Ann. 132; Charleston v. Benjamin, 2 Strobb. L. 503, 49 Am. Dec. 608; Specht v. Com. 3 Pa. 312, 49 Am. Dec. 518.

In Fiolickstein v. Mobile, 40 Ala. 726, it is said that "the legislature is not prohibited from making municipal regulations because they have the sanction also of a religious society," and adds that the designation of a day of rest would not infringe the constitution, whether that day should be the Christian or Jewish Sabbath.

In St. Joseph v. Elliott, 47 Mo. App. 418, it is said: "The truth is that some courts have concluded (perhaps without sufficient justification) that laws enacted for the observance of Sunday as a religious duty were repugnant to constitutions guaranteeing religious freedom, and yet determined to uphold them and set about to find other reasons than those based on Christianity. These reasons Ringgold in his work on the Law of Sunday, p. 101, declares to be an 'afterthought of the courts; that is to say, that it is an attempt to find a sanction for those statutes in Constitutions which have never been the moving cause of their enactment.' But the court says further, 'Whatever may be the reason for such statutes, they are valid enactments.'"

In considering the constitutionality of Sunday laws, it is well to remember that, as mentioned in Lindenmuller v. People, 33 Barb. 548, "the Sabbath is older than our state government; was a part of the laws of the colony; and its observance regulated by colonial laws;" therefore, in considering whether constitutional provisions were meant to preclude laws for Sunday observance, the fact that such laws existed at the time of, and before the adoption of the Constitution is very significant.

In Shover v. State, 10 Ark. 259, it is held that a statute prohibiting the sale of goods on Sunday does not violate constitutional provisions for freedom of worship, and that no person shall be compelled to attend, erect, or support any place of worship, or maintain any minister, against his consent.

In State v. Amba, 20 Mo. 214, a statute prohibiting Sunday labor is held not to violate constitutional provisions for freedom of worship and conscience, and that no person shall be hurt or molested in his religious profession or sentiments, if he does not disturb others, and that no preference shall be given to any sect or mode of worship.

So in Fiolickstein v. Mobile, 40 Ala. 726, such a statute is held valid as to a Jew, under constitutional provisions that no person shall be hurt, molested, or restrained in his religious sentiments or profession, provided he does not disturb others in their religious worship.

In Voglesong v. State, 9 Ind. 112, such a statute is upheld without discussion of its constitutionality, with the mere statement that this question is hardly open.

So in Ex parte Sundstrom, 25 Tex. App. 133, a Sunday law is upheld and declared not to violate the constitutional right of Jews, under provisions as to equal rights and freedom of worship.

To the same effect is Specht v. Com. 3 Pa. 312, 49 Am. Dec. 518, holding that even as to persons who observe the seventh day as the Sabbath, a Sunday law does not violate constitutional provisions for freedom of worship and conscience. This case follows Com. v. Wolf, 3 Serg. & R. 48, in which it was held that Jews were subject to the Sunday laws.

A Sunday closing law is also held valid as to a Jew in State v. Judge of Criminal Dist. Ct. of Orleans, 39 La. Ann. 132, deciding that it does not deny equal privileges or immunities, nor the right to life, liberty, and property nor to due process of law.

It is held in Com. v. Hyneman, 101 Mass. 30, that the law, as a law prohibiting sales of liquor on Sunday, applied to Jews, although they might be exempted from the Sunday law as to labor by their observance of the Jewish Sabbath.

But in Com. v. Haas, 122 Mass. 40, a statute prohibiting the opening of shops on Sunday is held good, even as to seventh day believers, and not a violation of the constitutional provision that "no subordination of any one sect or denomination shall ever be established by law."

The equal privileges and immunities of citizens are held in Johns v. State, 78 Ind. 332, 41 Am. Rep. 577, not to be violated by a statute against Sunday labor which excepts from its operation those who worship on the seventh day of the week.

While, on the other hand, an ordinance which makes an exception from the Sunday law of those who keep Saturday and close their place of business on that day, was held an unconstitutional discrimination between citizens. Shreveport v. Levy, 26 La. Ann. 671, 21 Am. Rep. 553.

Following this case it was held in Anonymous, 12 Abb. N. C. 455, that an injunction against the prosecution of a Jew for violation of the Sunday law would not be granted, notwithstanding an exception in the statute as to those who observed another day of the week, because the court regarded this exception as an unconstitutional discrimination between citizens.

Exactly opposite to this decision is the decision in Ohio that an ordinance prohibiting business on Sunday is void, if it does not make an exception of those who observe the seventh day. Canton v. Nist, 9 Ohio St. 429.

See on this point the case of People v. Bellmer, ante, 603.

States. (3) That said statute is void because it is in violation of article 36 of the Bill of Rights of the Constitution of Maryland. (8) That the circuit court for Kent county had no jurisdiction to try and convict the traverser, since the justice of the peace had no jurisdiction: First. Because (a) the warrant charged no offense under the statute, as it failed to set forth that the husking of corn on Sunday was not a work of necessity or charity. (b) The warrant shows upon its face that it was issued on Sunday, and its mandate is to apprehend the traverser immediately. It is admitted that it was actually served on Sunday. For these reasons it is void, and no jurisdiction could be acquired under it. Second. That the bond for appearance of the traverser in the circuit court is void because it held him to answer a charge of Sabbath breaking, and no such offense is known to the laws of this state; and it is also in fatal variance with the warrant, which says nothing of Sabbath breaking by the traverser, but charges him with husking corn on Sunday.

The attorney-general, on behalf of the state, moved to quash the writ of error on the ground that no writ of error lies to this court from the decision of the circuit court, on an appeal to it from the judgment of a justice of the peace. That motion must prevail. It is well settled in this state that, when the circuit court has jurisdiction to hear and decide an appeal from a justice of the peace, its decision is final, and an appeal or writ of error to this court will not lie, unless, of course, the statute authorizes such appeal or writ of error to this court. If the traverser desired to contest the constitutionality of the law under which he was arrested, and have that question properly presented for the consideration of this court, he could have applied for the writ of certiorari upon the specific ground of the unconstitutionality of the law, and the consequent want of power and jurisdiction of the justice of the peace to proceed under it. This court could then have reviewed the judgment of the circuit court on an appeal or writ of error. Nor can we review the decision of the circuit court

A statute prohibiting dramatic performances on Sunday is held constitutional in Lindenmuller v. People, 33 Barb. 548; Neuendorff v. Duryea, 60 N. Y. 557, 25 Am. Rep. 226; People v. Hoym, 30 How. Pr. 76.

These cases hold that such a law does not infringe liberty of conscience or the free exercise or enjoyment of religious privilege and worship without discrimination or preference.

A territorial statute prohibiting saloons to be open on Sunday has been held not contrary to public policy, in People v. Griffin, 1 Idaho, 476.

A statute prohibiting saloons to be opened on Sunday is not against the constitutional provision for the "uniform operation" of laws of a general nature. Ex parte Burke, 60 Cal. 6.

A statute prohibiting stores, workshops, saloons and other places of business from being open on Sunday is not a special law, within the meaning of a constitutional provision as to special laws. Ex parte Koser, 60 Cal. 177.

But a penal statute applicable to bakers only, prohibiting them from baking on Sunday, was held in Ex parte Westerfield, 55 Cal. 550, 36 Am. Rep. 47, to be a special law within the meaning of a constitutional provision against special laws for crimes and misdemeanors.

The validity of municipal ordinances prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, or other business on Sunday, except so far as it involves the question of legislative power to make Sunday laws, is not here considered. It is expressly held in Nashville v. Linck, 12 Lea, 499, that the legislature may authorize such ordinance.

In addition to the cases contained in this note, there are a very large number of cases in which the constitutionality of Sunday laws has been assumed and acted upon. Among these are all the cases found in the note on "Sunday Labor" with the case of Quarles v. State, 14 L. R. A. 192, also in the note on "Prohibition of Sunday Sports or Games," State v. O'Rourke, 17 L. R. A. 890, as well as the cases in the note on "Remedy of Party as to Rescission of Sunday Contract," with the case of Kelly v. Cogrove, 17 L. R. A. 779.

These cases are only a small portion in which Sunday laws have been enforced. It is very evident therefore, that the judicial sanction of Sunday laws, though they have been attacked on many points, has been very nearly unanimous. Considering the fact mentioned above, that Sunday laws were in existence in the colonies before the adoption of any state constitutions, and that Sunday is incidentally recognized in many of the state constitutions, as in its exception from the computation of days within which a bill must be returned by the governor, it is plain that the people in adopting the constitution of such a state did not intend by any implication to deny the validity of such laws. Therefore, if they were to be held unconstitutional, it could only be on the ground of inevitable repugnance to some fundamental provision of the constitution. That such laws are not repugnant to fundamental constitutional principles is now so universally established in every jurisdiction in which such laws have been attacked that it would seem to be settled as fully as judicial decisions can settle anything.

And a statute prohibiting barbers only from keeping open a bathroom on Sunday is held unconstitutional class legislation. Raglo v. State, 26 Tenn. 272.

In these two cases last cited, it will be seen that the same act which other persons could do lawfully was made an offense when done by a particular class of persons.

But a Sunday statute excepting druggists from its provisions is not unconstitutional as a denial of equal rights, or as a special law. Bohl v. State, 3 Tex. App. 683.

And a Sunday law is not void for discrimination between classes of persons and as a denial of equal rights, privileges, and immunities, because it does not apply to certain classes of business, but excepts from its operations drug-stores, offices of physicians, photograph galleries, railroad offices, hotels, restaurants, and various other kinds of business. Liberman v. State, 26 Neb. 464.

The exemption from a Sunday law of those who observe the seventh day does not make the statute void. Ibid.

The title "An Act to preserve the public peace and order" on Sunday is sufficient for a statute prohibiting dramatic entertainments in New York city on that day. Neuendorff v. Duryea, 60 N. Y. 557, 25 Am. Rep. 226.

So the title of an act which states that it is to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors to minors, drunken persons, etc., is sufficient to cover the prohibition of such sales on Sunday. Kurtz v. People, 38 Mich. 273.

on the question of the alleged defects on the face of the warrant and bond. That court had the power and authority to entertain the appeal from the judgment of the justice on the question of jurisdiction, as well as on other grounds, and, the plaintiff in error having invoked and submitted himself to its jurisdiction, its judgment is final and conclusive. The case of Rayner v. State, 52 Md. 368, is directly in point, and it is unnecessary to refer to the other decisions of this court.

The attorney for the plaintiff in error argued at considerable length the constitutionality of the Sunday law involved in this case, and urgently requested this court to pass upon that question, regardless of our views on the motion to quash the writ of error. Having determined that the case is not properly before us, we do not feel called upon to discuss at length the cases cited or reasons assigned by the learned counsel, but, as a refusal to state our conclusions might be deemed by some an indication of doubt on our part, we will briefly state our views on this subject. We have not the slightest hesitation in announcing that the law complained of is not in conflict with the constitution of the United States or of Maryland. Although the argument of the attorney for the plaintiff in error gave evidence of thorough research and great labor, as well as ingenuity and ability, he was compelled to admit that, if we were to be governed by precedent, he had no standing in court, as the cases were opposed to his contention.

There have been numerous decisions in this country, as well as elsewhere, sustaining such law, and we have no desire to be the exception to the general rule. Nature, experience, and observation suggest the propriety and necessity of one day of rest, and the day generally adopted is Sunday. There are, and always will be, honest differences of opinion as to how Sunday shall be spent, but the advantages of having a weekly day of rest, "from a mere physical and political standpoint," are too apparent to permit us to doubt the propriety of having reasonable laws to regulate work on that day. In interpreting them, courts must not place unreasonable constructions upon them. There may be some circumstances under which it would be deemed harsh and severe to punish a man for husking corn on Sunday; but if he defies the laws of the state, or makes himself obnoxious to those desiring the quiet and peace of this day of rest, he should expect the machinery of the law to be put in motion.

If the position taken by the plaintiff in error in reference to the law in question is correct, then the law prohibiting the sale of liquor, etc., on Sunday, is unconstitutional, as would be most, if not all, of our laws concerning Sunday. If the legislature cannot prohibit work, etc., on Sunday, as forbidden by section 247 of article 27 of the Code, why should it be permitted to prohibit the sale of liquor, goods, wares, or merchandise, or prohibit dancing saloons, opera houses, barber shops, etc., from being kept open on that day? The laws and courts of this state have recognized Sunday as a day of rest from the 22 L. R. A.

time the state was formed, and statutes on the subject that were in force in colonial days are still in our Code. This court has, from time to time, given expression to its views on the question in very clear and unequivocal terms.

In Kilgour v. Miles, 6 Gill & J. 274, Judge Chambers, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The Sabbath is emphatically the day of rest, and the day of rest here is the 'Lord's day' or Christian's Sunday. Ours is a Christian community, and a day set apart as the day of rest is the day consecrated by the resurrection of our Savior, and embraces the 24 hours next ensuing the midnight of Saturday." In State v. Fearson, 2 Md. 818, Judge Mason, in passing upon the charge of permitting persons to bet on cards on Sunday, contrary to the statute then in force, sustained the law, and added that, "independent of any statutory prohibition, this is a gross offense against decency and public morals, and therefore richly merits punishment."

In Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Lehman, 56 Md. 227, 40 Am. Rep. 415, Judge Alvey, in speaking of Sunday laws in the different states, said: "They are substantially the same in their general scope and provision, all looking to keeping the day sacred, and as one of rest from secular employment;" and in other cases our Sunday laws have been enforced. Some of the statutes in force in this state were passed as early as 1728; the one complained of in this case bearing that date originally, and being continued in the Code of 1888. The tendency of legislation in this country is to provide for further rest, rather than to take away "the day of rest" that is welcomed by the industrious and hard-working people of our land. As late as 1899 the legislature of Maryland passed a law authorizing banks in the city of Baltimore to close their doors for business at 12 o'clock noon on every Saturday in the year, and provided for the payment of notes, etc., falling due on Saturday, "on the next succeeding secular or business day."

Article 36 of our Declaration of Rights guarantees religious liberty; but the members of the distinguished body that adopted that constitution never supposed they were giving a deathblow to Sunday laws by inserting that article. Those laws do not prohibit or interfere with the worship of God on any day other than Sunday, nor do they compel any one to worship him on Sunday. It is undoubtedly true that rest from secular employment on Sunday does have a tendency to foster and encourage the Christian religions, of all sects and denominations, that observe that day, as rest from work and ordinary occupations enables many to engage in public worship who probably would not otherwise do so. But it would scarcely be asked of a court, in what professes to be a Christian land, to declare a law unconstitutional because it requires rest from bodily labor on Sunday, except works of necessity and charity, and thereby promotes the cause of Christianity. If the Christian religion is, incidentally or otherwise, benefited or fostered by having this day of rest (as it undoubtedly is), there is all the more reason for the enforcement of laws that help to preserve it. While courts have generally sustained Sunday laws as "civil regulation," their decisions will have no less weight if they are shown to be in accordance with divine law as well as human. There are many most excellent citizens of this state who worship God on a day other than Sunday, and our constitution guarantees to them the right to do so,—a right which no one can interfere with. The legislature of this state has not undertaken to prohibit work on the day observed by them, and hence they do not have, in their religious work, the advantage of having their Sabbath made a day of rest by human law; but the legislature has not in any way interfered with their religious liberty, or with their worship of God in such manner as they think most acceptable to Him, as they have a right to do under the above provision in the declaration of rights. If, then, the question was properly before us, we would decide that section 247 of article 27 of the Code was not in violation of the Constitution of the United States or of the constitution of this state, but, as stated above, we must quash the writ of error for the reasons given.

Writ of error quashed, with costs.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Ada County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Morgan, J.:

Plaintiff brought suit against defendant corporation to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff by reason and on account of negligence of defendant. The complaint alleges the corporate character of defendant, and "that on the 20th day of June, 1890, while defendant owned, controlled, and operated a railroad in Ada county, in the state of Idaho, and in the town of Nampa, in said Ada county, Idaho, said defendant negligently, carelessly, etc., allowed, permitted, and caused freight cars and locomotive steam engine to stand, to be, and to remain on their railroad track in said town of Nampa, county and state as aforesaid, in such manner as to block a public highway, commonly known as the 'Boise City, Nampa and River Wagon Road,' designated on plat of Nampa as 'Street F,' at a place or point where the Oregon Short Line and Utah Northern Railway and its switches cross said street, about 175 yards west of the passenger depot of defendant, in said town of Nampa, for the period of about one and one half hours,—from about 7:30 A. M. to about the hour of nine o'clock A. M. on the 20th day of June, 1890. That on the 20th day of June, 1890, this plaintiff was a resident of the territory (now state) of Idaho, and of said town of Nampa, and employed as a day laborer by Ruel Murphy, in said town of Nampa. That as such day laborer, and in the course of the discharge of his duties, plaintiff was required and compelled to cross the railroad at the said street and wagon-road crossing, while said street, highway, and wagon road were so stopped up and blockaded as aforesaid by defendant. That, in order to cross the defendant's railroad at the time and place mentioned herein, this plaintiff was compelled to cross under one of the defendant's freight cars so blockading and stopping up said street, highway, and wagon road as and in the manner aforesaid. That while the plaintiff was so endeavoring and attempting to cross the said railroad track at the time and place aforesaid, and by passing under one of the cars blockading said crossing, defendant carelessly, negligently, and unlawfully, and without warning this plaintiff, without blowing any whistle, without ringing any bell, and without any warning or alarm whatever, suddenly, carelessly, and unlawfully started in quick motion, and to moving the said locomotive steam engine and freight cars which were so blockading said street, wagon road, and public highway as aforesaid, in such a manner as to knock this plaintiff down, and to pass the wheels of one of said freight cars over the left leg of this plaintiff, crushing, mangling, breaking, and bruising said left leg in such a way and manner as to render the amputation of said leg so mangled, broken, and bruised, just below the knee joint, necessary. . . .

That said injury was not caused or brought about by any careless, negligent, or unlawful act or acts or by contributory negligence of this plaintiff,"—etc., and claims damages in the sum of $20,000. To this complaint defendant interposed a general demurrer that complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. This demurrer was overruled, to which ruling defendant excepted. Defendant then filed its answer, wherein it denied "each and every allegation" of the complaint "except what is herein specifically admitted; denies that it permitted its freight cars and locomotive steam engine to stand and be upon its track, in the town of Nampa in such manner as to blockade a public highway, wagon road, and street, commonly known as the 'Boise City, Nampa and River Wagon Road,' and designated on the plat of Nampa as 'Street F,' or any other public highway, wagon road, or street; denies that there is a public highway, wagon road, or street at a point 175 yards west of the defendant's depot, in the town of Nampa; denies that it did carelessly, negligently, wickedly, criminally, and unlawfully start its locomotive steam engine and freight cars in motion without warning this plaintiff by ringing its bell and blowing its whistle;" and as a further cause of defense, "that at the time and place this plaintiff alleges he was injured he was a trespasser upon defendant's railway tracks;" "that the injuries complained of by the plaintiff were occasioned by his own carelessness and negligence." Upon the issues thus made up the case went to trial before the court with a jury. The plaintiff having rested his case upon the proofs made in support thereof, defendant moved the court for a nonsuit, upon the ground that "the plaintiff has failed to prove the allegation of his complaint, and failed to make out a cause of action against the defendant; and for the further reason that the evidence in this cause produced on behalf of the plaintiff shows that he was guilty of contributory negligence, and therefore not entitled to recover," which motion was overruled by the court. The defendant declining to offer any evidence, the case was submitted to the jury under instructions from the court, and a verdict was returned in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $10,275. A motion for a new trial was made, which was overruled by the district judge, and from the order overruling said motion, as well as from the judgment, this appeal is taken.

Mr. Edgar Wilson, for appellant:

As a matter of law, the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in passing under defendant's car as set forth in detail in plaintiff's complaint.

Mr. Beach defines contributory negligence to be "such an act or omission on the part of the plaintiff, amounting to a want of ordinary care, as concurring or co-operating with the negligent act of the defendant, is a proximate cause or occasion of the injury complained of."

1 Harris, Damages by Corp. p. 408; Beach, Contrib. Neg. p. 7.

The doctrine of contributory negligence is to be taken with this qualification: that if, in addition to the negligence of the defendant, there enters the element of malice or pure willfulness, the contributory negligence of plaintiff is a false quality, and defendant is liable. Although one may have placed himself in a position of danger, yet if the defendant needlessly, or wantonly, or recklessly injures him, the plaintiff can still recover.

1 Harris, Damages by Corp. p. 333, citing Weeks, Damnum Absque Injuria, 242, citing Litchfield Coal Co. v. Taylor, 81 Ill. 590; Indianapolis & C. R. Co. v. McCuire, 26 Ind. 370, 89 Am. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co.* 50 Mo. 461, 11 Am. Rep. 420; State v. Manchester & L. R. Co. 52 N. H. 528.

In the absence of such willfulness or wantonness the general rule is that if the injured party might by the exercise of ordinary care have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence, and did not, the defendant will neither be held liable, nor will the damages be apportioned between them.

A person who, by his own fault or negligence, has brought upon himself a loss or an injury, can claim no compensation for it from another.

Hutchinson, Carr. § 635, p. 502.

It is contributory negligence, if, in the attempt to avoid that which is merely inconvenient and in no sense dangerous the person injured encounters a danger obviously apparent to the minds of reasonable men.

Where the contributory negligence of the person injured is dependent upon his knowledge of the existence of a fact, he, if not physically or mentally incapacitated, must be assumed to have had that knowledge, if he had such opportunity of knowing the fact as would have made it known to a person of average capacity exercising ordinary care for his own safety.

Patterson, Railway Accident Law, p. 50; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Henderson, supra.

Plaintiff cannot act upon his suppositions, and then, when he is injured by reason of their being unfounded, make it the predicate of a charge of negligence on the part of the defendant.

Snyder v. Viola Min. & Smelting Co. 2 Idaho, 777.

Contributory negligence may, therefore, be defined to be that want of reasonable care upon the part of the person injured which concurred with the negligence of the railway in causing the injury.

The reason of the rule is that the defendant cannot justly be called upon to indemnify the plaintiff for a wrong which the plaintiff has done himself.

Mr. J. W. Badger also for respondent.

Morgan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The record presents to us a "statement on motion for new trial," which contains what purports to be a statement of all the evidence in the case, together with the objections to the admission of evidence, the ruling.

ings of the district court thereon, and the exceptions thereto. Appended to the statement is the following certificate: "State of Idaho, County of Ada—ss. At chambers, this statement settled and allowed in the presence of Edgar Wilson, attorney for defendant, and T. D. Cahalan, attorney for plaintiff, to which ruling and action of the undersigned the plaintiff, by his said counsel, then and there excepted, for the reason that the alleged exception to errors of law as alleged occurring during the trial of said action were not taken in accordance with section 4426, Revised Statutes of Idaho, September 31, 1893. E. Nugent, Judge." It would seem that upon the trial of said cause a stipulation was entered into by the counsel for the several parties "that any exception taken during the trial of said cause may be settled at any time within twenty days subsequent to the termination of said trial, without reducing the same to writing, and settling the same at the time they are made in said trial." It is claimed by respondent that, as no bill of exceptions was ever served or settled on the part of the defendant, such exceptions cannot now be considered or reviewed by this court, although they appear in the statement on motion for a new trial, and settled by the district judge, and were heard, considered, and passed upon by said judge upon said motion. Section 4426, Rev. Stat. Idaho, contains the following provision: "Except as provided in the next section, the exception must be taken and settled at the time the decision is made, and no order of court shall be made for the settlement of such exception at any other time, except by the agreement of both parties. When an exception is taken, the court, judge, tribunal, or judicial officer shall allow sufficient time for the reduction to writing, and settlement of the same, and in case such time shall not be allowed, or such exception shall not be fairly settled, the facts may be shown by affidavit and the party taking such exception may apply to the court, or tribunal, to which an appeal lies, in the action or proceeding, to settle the same fairly, according to the facts, and when so settled, the same shall become a part of the record in such action or proceeding." The paragraphs above quoted were interpolated into section 4426 by an act of the territorial legislature of January 31, 1887. The statutes, as they stood prior to this amendment, were amply sufficient to preserve all the rights of litigants. But nevertheless it is the statute, and so long as it remains, and counsel see fit to avail themselves of its provisions, the court must recognize and enforce it. By the provisions of section 4426, as above cited, where all exceptions are settled at the time they are made, it would seem that nothing further is required at the hands of the trial court, as to the settlements of exceptions. Each exception, when so settled, is a "bill of exceptions," and as such may be embodied in the statement on motion for a new trial, or may be the sole basis of a motion. The view that the amendment of January 31, 1887, was a mere act of expediency is apparent when we consider that section 4430, which provides for the settlement of bills of exceptions was allowed to remain undisturbed. We cannot say that there is necessarily any conflict between sections 4426 and 4480. The contention of counsel for the respondent would seem to be that, as no exceptions were settled as provided in sections 4426 or 4480, therefore none can be reviewed by this court. We think counsel are wrong in this contention. Section 4820, Rev. Stat. Idaho, provides what papers it is requisite for the party appealing to furnish the court upon an appeal from an order granting or overruling a motion for a new trial, to wit, "the papers designated in section 4443 of this Code." Referring to section 4443, we find that the papers designated therein are: "The judgment roll and the affidavits, or the records and files in the action, or bill of exceptions, or statement, as the case may be, used on the hearing, with a copy of the order made, shall constitute the record to be used on appeal from the order granting or refusing a new trial," etc., and the provisions of this section seem to have been substantially complied with in the case under consideration. The error into which counsel seem to have fallen is in assuming that it is only by a compliance with the provisions of section 4426 that exceptions taken in the district court can be brought before the appellate court. The incorporation of the exceptions in a statement used on motion for a new trial has always been considered under the Code a proper and legitimate method of bringing the same before this court for review. The method of bringing cases here upon bills of exception is only an additional, and frequently more convenient and expeditious, one than that by statement; but either method is effectual.

The next question which the court is called upon to consider is the sufficiency of the complaint. It would appear at first sight that the plaintiff has pleaded himself out of court, inasmuch as he has stated that he was compelled to and did pass under the freight cars of the defendant while they were so blockading the street as above alleged. It is difficult to conceive how the plaintiff could, in the prosecution of his ordinary occupation, be compelled to pass under the freight cars of the defendant, as there could hardly be such a condition of things that it would not be possible for the plaintiff to go around the train instead of under it. It would also seem that there could hardly be a condition of things existing where in passing under one of the cars of a freight train it would not necessarily be contributory negligence, and bar a recovery. We are not prepared to say, however, that under this complaint a state of facts could not be proven which would entitle the plaintiff to recover, and therefore sustain the court below in overruling the demurrer. Should the motion for nonsuit have been granted, the evidence on the part of the plaintiff having been fully taken, and appearing on the record in the transcript herein, and no evidence being offered on the part of defendant? The defendant interposed its motion for nonsuit on the ground that the facts as proven do not entitle the plaintiff to recover; that plaintiff was guilty of such contributory negligence as would bar a recovery. The testimony shows beyond controversy the following facts substantially: That on the 30th day of June, 1890, the defendant permitted and caused a train of freight cars, with an engine thereto attached, to stand upon its track in such way as to blockade F street in the town of Nampa, in this state; that the train was permitted to so remain half an hour to an hour and a half,—precise time not proven. Plaintiff was a laborer, and was working in a livery and feed stable. On that morning he was called to breakfast about half past 7. When he was called to breakfast he passed under the cars, going and again coming back to the stable. "After going back to the barn," he says, "I was told to go and fix a wind pump. I had to cross on F street again, and passed under the car. I then had to go back for a bolt, passed under again." In short, defendant states that he went under the cars that morning three times and back three times, in all he passed under the cars six times. There was nothing to hinder plaintiff passing around the train at either end at any time, except that it was inconvenient, and took too much time. He could have passed around the train by walking 100 to 185 yards and back. Plaintiff was an adult, and in possession of all his faculties. When plaintiff attempted to pass under the cars the sixth time, the engineer started the train up, without ringing the bell or blowing the whistle; at least the witnesses state that they did not hear either whistle or bell. Plaintiff was caught by the wheels, and his leg crushed. The law in regard to cases of a similar character is well settled. We quote a few of the many cases at hand. When by law ringing the bell and sounding the whistle are required in approaching and passing over public crossings, the omission thereof amounts to actual negligence on the part of the company. But such omission and negligence do not render the company liable for injuries received at such crossings, unless the omission be the cause thereof or contribute thereto, without contributory negligence of the injured party, if in those states where the doctrine of contributory negligence prevails. 2 Rorer, Railroads, 1006. It is such gross negligence and want of care, and so reckless an act, for a person to pass under the cars, though standing still at the inception of the effort, that if an injury is received in the attempt a recovery cannot be had against the company for the same, even if the cars be suddenly started without giving the usual signal for starting and thereby cause the injury. 2 Rorer, Railroads, 1130; Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Copeland, 61 Ala. 380. Negligence in the railroad company in giving the signals or in omitting signals of any kind will not excuse plaintiff's omission to be diligent in such use of his own means of avoiding danger; and where, by such use of his senses, the traveler might avoid danger, notwithstanding the neglect to give signals or warning, his omission is contributory negligence, and should be so peremptorily declared by the court; and, where, proof of this is clear, the plaintiff thus negligent should be nonsuited. Ernst v. Hudson River R. Co. 39 N. Y. 68, 100 Am. Dec. 405. The doctrine of contributory negligence has been recognized as the true doctrine by this court in the case of Snyder v. Viola Min. & Smelting Co., 2 Idaho, 777. The rule may therefore be formulated in these terms: Where the person injured, or the plaintiff, or any person whose negligence is attributable to the plaintiff, has so far contributed to the injury by his want of ordinary care that, but for such want of ordinary care on his part, the injury would not have been done, the railway is not liable to the plaintiff in damages for such injury. Thus stated, the rule is supported by innumerable authorities. Patterson, Railway Accident Law, pp. 46, 47, and a large number of cases there cited. The reason for the rule seems clearly to be as follows: The reason why, in cases of mutual concurring negligence, neither party can maintain an action against the other, is not that the wrong of the one is set off against the wrong of the other; it is that the law cannot measure how much of the damage suffered is attributable to the plaintiff's own fault. If he were allowed to recover, it might be that he would obtain from the other party compensation for his own misconduct. Patterson, Railway Accident Law, 47; Heil v. Glanding, 42 Pa. 498, 498, 82 Am. Dec. 537. Contributory negligence is therefore defined to be that want of reasonable care upon the part of the person injured which concurred in the negligence of the railway in causing the injury. Patterson, Railway Accident Law, 48. The number of authorities that might be quoted in support of this doctrine leaves no doubt that it is founded upon correct principles. In Rauch v. Lloyd, 81 Pa. 870, 72 Am. Dec. 747, the court says that, if the plaintiff is an adult of ordinary prudence and discretion, he would have no right of action; for, however blameworthy the defendants may have been in leaving their cars on the crossing, common prudence would have restrained him from attempting to pass under them, and an adult would be bound to use common prudence. 2 Rorer, Railroads, 1018.

The fact that it was attempted to be proven, over the repeated objection of defendant, that it was the custom of the people of the town of Nampa to crawl under the cars when they blockaded the streets, if fully proven, could not have the slightest effect upon the plaintiff's right to recover, as a custom of the people in putting themselves daily in imminent danger of their lives in passing under cars blockading the streets with an engine attached thereto could not excuse the plaintiff in his indulgence in conduct so reckless and so wanting in ordinary prudence and care. While it is improper and unlawful for a railroad company to unnecessarily blockade a street of a town or city with its cars, yet every man is bound at his peril to use ordinary care to preserve his own life and limbs, however unlawful the conduct of the agents and servants of the company may be; therefore all evidence of the custom of the people in passing under the cars so blockading the streets was irrelevant and incompetent, and should have been excluded. The failure of the plaintiff—an adult in the full possession of his faculties of seeing, hearing, and reasoning—to exercise ordinary care to protect himself from danger so imminent will bar his recovery. The plaintiff cannot be relieved from the effects of his own negligence by the fact that there is a statute prohibiting the railroad company from obstructing the streets with their cars, or requiring the bell to be rung, or whistle sounded. Hudson v. Wabash W. R. Co. 101 Mo. 13. See also decisions cited above: Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Pinchin, 112 Ind. 592; 2 Thomp. Neg. 1175; Reynolds v. Hindman, 82 Iowa, 146. When, by law, bell ringing and sounding the whistle are required in approaching and passing over public road crossings, the omission thereof amounts to actual negligence; but such omission and negligence do not render the company liable for injuries received at such crossings unless the omission be the cause thereof or contribute thereto without contributory negligence of the injured party. 2 Rorer, Railroads, 1006; Reynolds v. Hindman, supra; Pennsylvania Co. v. Rathgeb, 82 Ohio St. 66; Krauss v. Walkill Valley R. Co. 69 Hun, 482; Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Wallace, 110 Ill. 114, 19 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 359; Schofield v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 114 U. S. 615, 29 L. ed. 224. The omission of the railway company to give statutory or other signals does not render it liable for injuries to one who, in crossing its track, fails to observe care on his own part. Krauss v. Walkill Valley R. Co. 69 Hun, 483; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Morgan, 81 Kan. 77. A railroad company and a traveler on the highway have correlative rights. Neither has a superior right, except as it results from the difficulties and necessities of the case. Galena & C. U. R. Co. v. Dill, 22 Ill. 264. But, a traveler approaching a crossing at the same time as a train, the traveler must give way as a matter of prudence, and because the necessities of the public are greater than those of any one person. Proof that the railroad company had blockaded the streets of Nampa at any other time than the time when the accident occurred does not prove nor tend to prove that the street was blockaded at the time the accident occurred, nor does it excuse the plaintiff for not exercising ordinary care and prudence in protecting his own person, and such proof should have been excluded. Gahagan v. Boston & L. R. Co. 1 Allen, 187, 79 Am. Dec. 724. As to custom. Neither habit of railroad company in blockading the streets of Nampa nor habit of people in creeping under cars so blockading streets, can have anything to do with the case at bar. These are not such customs as the law recognizes and enforces. Customs such as are contemplated in the law must be certain, reasonable, and ancient, and then in some cases have the force of law. It is true that a railway company running through the streets of a crowded city, where many people are passing and repassing across railroad tracks intersecting the streets, are held to greater care in running their trains, and guarding the crossings; and it is held that railway companies must take notice of the fact that such streets are frequently crowded, and therefore exercise greater care. So, if F street, in the town of Nampa, was much frequented by the people, and many were accustomed to cross and recross the railroad tracks on said streets, and such facts were known to the company, greater care and prudence would be required of the company in running its trains across said street, as human life is more valuable than the business or time of any individual; but, because greater care would be required of the railway company, this would not authorize the individual to relax one jot or tittle of the care and prudence necessary to protect his own life or limb. Therefore any negligence of the company in failing to comply with statutory requirements or in failing to exercise reasonable care and prudence, does not absolve the plaintiff from the necessity of exercising necessary care and prudence. We are of the opinion, therefore, that plaintiff, in passing under the cars of defendant five times on the morning of the accident, and attempting to pass under them the sixth time, was guilty of contributory negligence of an extraordinary character, and that such negligence bars recovery. The motion for nonsuit should have been allowed.

This opinion sufficiently indicates the errors in the instructions, and, as this decision holds that the nonsuit should have been granted, which practically ends the case, we do not deem it necessary to further notice the instructions.

The judgment of the lower court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to enter a judgment of nonsuit. Costs awarded to defendant.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

Christopher CRISP

v.

FORT WAYNE & ELMWOOD R. CO.,
Pf. in Err.

(.....Mich.....)

A garnishee paying into court the amount due the principal defendant in advance of an adjudication, as allowed by How. Anno. Stat., § 8037, which expressly excepts the sum of $25 due to a householder for personal labor, does so at his peril, unless the principal defendant is estopped by circumstances from asserting his claim for this exemption, since the garnishee may always protect himself by his disclosure by stating at least that he does not know whether the principal defendant is or is not a householder.

(Long and Grant, JJ., dissent.)

(February 12, 1894.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover wages for which defendant had been garnished at the suit of a third person, and which in that proceeding it had paid into court for distribution. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Edwin F. Conely and Orla B. Taylor, for plaintiff in error;

The principal defendant has the right to appear and defend.

Wilson v. Bartholomew, 45 Mich. 41; Chilcote v. Conley, 38 Ohio St. 545; Curran v. Fleming, 76 Ga. 98.

Mr. Lodge acted with entire propriety in attempting to be heard in the first garnishment case in justice court, and, if the justice refused to hear him, he had an ample remedy by certiorari. That he did not invoke its aid is not the fault of the defendant; if the principal defendant did not take enough interest in the matter to protect his rights, certainly the garnishee defendant, who has no interest whatever, cannot be blamed for not proceeding. He had ample notice of all of the garnishments, and this is all that could in justice be required of the garnishee defendant.

Pierce v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 283.

The garnishee defendant exonerated itself from liability by payment into court.

Melton v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 89 Mo. App. 194.

And if Crisp has failed to assert his rights promptly and vigilantly when notified, he has no redress.

Iliff v. Arnott, 81 Kan. 673.

There is no duty imposed on the garnishee defendant to investigate the domestic relations of the principal defendant.

Barber v. Howd, 85 Mich. 221; Karp v. Citizens Nat. Bank of Saginaw, 76 Mich. 679; Moore v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 43 Iowa, 385; Laidlaw v. Morrow, 44 Mich. 547; Hebel v. Amazon Ins. Co. of Cincinnati, 83 Mich. 400.

An exemption is a purely personal right which cannot be negotiated or transferred, and such defense must be set up by the principal defendant.

Osborne v. Schutt, 67 Mo. 713; Moore v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. supra; Conley v. Chilcote, 25 Ohio St. 320; Jones v. Tracy, 75 Pa. 417.

The question as to whether a defendant is a householder should be determined by the court and not by the garnishee defendant.

Moore v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. supra;

NOTE.—The duty of a garnishee to set up the exemption of the principal debtor or to protect himself by disclosing at least his lack of knowledge concerning it is decided in the above case in accordance with the weight of authority as shown by that part of the note to Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Smith (Miss.) 19 L. R. A. 580.

Mr. Frank T. Lodge, for defendant in error:

Garnishment proceedings depend solely upon statute. The construction of the statute is strict, and no liability whatever is cast upon the garnishee defendant except by virtue of express statutory provisions.

People v. Cass County Circuit Judge, 39 Mich. 407; Sievers v. Woodburn Sarven Wheel Co. 48 Mich. 275; Blake v. Hubbard, 45 Mich. 1; Ford v. Detroit Dry Dock Co. 50 Mich. 358; Folkerts v. Standish, 55 Mich. 468; Milwaukee Bridge & Iron Works v. Brecoort, 78 Mich. 155.

The law favors exemption.

The statute makes this money exempt.

How. Anno. Stat. § 8082.

Defendant had notice that plaintiff was a householder and claimed this money as exempt.

Defendant's disclosures as garnishee of plaintiff do not even hint at the fact of the disclosed indebtedness being exempt or claimed as exempt.

Defendant might have disclosed all the facts and thus have been relieved from all further annoyance from plaintiff Pluff.

Curran v. Fleming, supra; Hosley v. Scott 59 Mich. 420; Emmons v. Southern Bell Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 80 Ga. 760.

It was defendant's duty to disclose all the facts, including plaintiff's claim of exemption rights, or it cannot seek to screen itself here by relying on the garnishment proceedings.

Sexton v. Amos, 39 Mich. 695; Hosley v. Scott and Drake Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. supra; Mace v. Heath, 84 Neb. 54, 790; Turner v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. 19 Neb. 247; Coleman v. Scott, 27 Neb. 77; Parker v. Wilson, 61 Vt. 116.

The law regards garnishment proceedings with disfavor and construes strictly defenses founded upon them.

Maynards v. Cornwell, 8 Mich. 809; Weimeister v. Manville, 44 Mich. 408; Iron Oliffs Co. v. Lahais, 52 Mich. 394; Folkerts v. Standish, supra; Hanselman v. Kegel, 60 Mich. 540; Farwell v. Chambers, 62 Mich. 316; Sexton v. Amos and Drake v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. supra.

Garnishee defendants cannot avail themselves of payment of money into court in any case except by virtue of express statutory provisions, and the only provision in the Michigan statutes expressly excepts cases of this kind.

How. Anno. Stat. § 8087.

The garnishee defendant cannot admit away or prejudice his creditor's rights or the rights of others.

Hebel v. Amazon Ins. Co. of Cincinnati, 83 Mich. 400; Hirth v. Pfeifle, 42 Mich. 81; Tabor v. Van Vranken, 39 Mich. 795; Marathon School Dist. No. 4 v. Gage, supra.

As to this plaintiff, the garnishment judgments are not res adjudicata, and the money may be recovered, notwithstanding the justice's 23 L. R. A.

release, although it does not appear that there was any release in this case.

Curran v. Fleming, 76 Ga. 98.

The defendant can claim no consideration because it paid this money into court.

Tabor v. Van Vranken and Emmons v. Southern Bell Teleph. & Teleg. Co. supra.

It was not authorized to do so.

Marathon School Dist. No. 4 v. Gage, Wilson v. Bartholomew, Anderson v. Odell, Drake v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. and Emmons v. Southern Bell Teleph. & Teleg. Co. supra.

Such a course, if sanctioned, would work great hardship to this plaintiff and others similarly situated, and would nullify a beneficial and protective provision of the law.

Curran v. Fleming and Emmons v. Southern Bell Teleph. & Teleg. Co. supra.

It disposes of the plaintiff's money, to which he has a statutory right, without notice to him and without giving him the "day in court" to which even the meanest and least deserving are entitled.

Ibid.

It was not the intention of the framers of the statute to exempt this money from being withheld from plaintiff by means of garnishment proceedings until he should prove his right to it by certiorari or other proceedings in court, but to exempt it from garnishment process. The provision of the statute is, "Nothing herein contained shall be applicable," etc.

1 How. Anno. Stat. § 8082; Wilson v. Bartholomew, Curran v. Fleming, and Emmons v. Southern Bell Teleph. & Teleg. Co. supra.

Hooker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant, being garnished in a proceeding in justice's court wherein the plaintiff was principal defendant, disclosed that it was indebted to the principal defendant for his personal labor, but was silent as to whether he was a householder. It does not appear that the fact was within the knowledge of the garnishee defendant, though there was testimony tending to show that it had been so informed by him. At the close of the examination the garnishee paid to the justice all money that was due to the principal defendant, and it was applied to the judgment against him. This action was thereupon brought against the garnishee defendant by the principal debtor to recover his exemptions, which he claims that the garnishee defendant could not lawfully pay over to the justice.

A garnishee proceeding is purely statutory. If the garnishee would protect himself from an action by his creditor, he must see that he takes each step in conformity to law. In other words, he cannot waive any rights of the principal debtor without incurring a personal liability. Hirth v. Pfeifle, 42 Mich. 81.

The proceeding is statutory, and in derogation of the common law, and the statute must be strictly followed, to bind the principal defendant. Maynards v. Cornwell, 8 Mich. 809; People v. Cass County Circuit Judge, 39 Mich. 407; Sievers v. Woodburn Sarven Wheel Co. 48 Mich. 275; Ford v. Detroit Dry Dock Co. 50 Mich. 358.

In Hanselman v. Kegel, 60 Mich. 540, this court said: "The proceedings under the garnishee statutes are in derogation of the common law. Not only must the statutes be strictly construed, but there is no authority for any action or prohibition of action outside of them."

Section 8032, How. Anno. Stat., says that the act shall not apply to $25 of the amount due the principal defendant, where he is a householder, and the demand was for his personal labor; and section 8087, which permits payment of any sum to the justice in advance of the adjudication, expressly excepts this labor claim.

As the right did not exist independent of the statute, and as the statute does not compel it, but on the contrary expressly denies it, I think the payment of such sum is at the peril of the garnishee, unless circumstances create an estoppel which should preclude the principal defendant from asserting such claim against the garnishee. It may be said that this is a hardship upon the garnishee; that he must determine at his peril whether the principal defendant is or is not the householder, when he may have no means of ascertaining the fact. It may be admitted that the law might be improved, but the hardship is not a necessary one. There is no law that compels a garnishee to determine the question, and to testify accordingly. He may state any fact that has come to his knowledge, by hearsay or otherwise; and it is his duty to do so, under the repeated decisions of this court. Drake v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 69 Mich. 168; Sexton v. Amos, 39 Mich. 695.

He may always safely state that he does not know whether the principal defendant is the householder, and, until it appears that he is not, the labor claim is secure; for, unless the disclosure shows a clear liability of the fund to the process, it cannot be reached. People v. Cass County Circuit Judge, 39 Mich. 407; Sexton v. Amos, supra; Lyon v. Kneeland, 58 Mich. 570; Newell v. Blair, 7 Mich. 103; Thomas v. Sprague, 12 Mich. 120; Welliver v. Soule, 30 Mich. 481; Hewitt v. Wagar Lumber Co. 38 Mich. 701; Hackley v. Kanitz, 39 Mich. 393; Spears v. Chapman, 43 Mich. 541; Weirich v. Scribner, 44 Mich. 73; Lorman v. Phania Ins. Co. 33 Mich. 65.

Thus it is seen that the garnishee may always protect himself by his disclosure, and he may perhaps do the same by giving the principal defendant an opportunity to appear and defend the suit against the garnishee, without which the fund cannot be reached unless he chooses to pay it to the justice. But there is no room for an estoppel here, because the illegal payment was not made in reliance on any representation of the principal defendant, but of defendant's own volition.

The judgment will be affirmed.

McGrath, Ch. J., and Montgomery, J., concurred with Hooker, J.

Long, J., dissenting:

On January 2, 1892, Morris Pluff commenced suit in justice's court by summons against the plaintiff, and on January 21, a judgment was entered by consent against the plaintiff for $47 damages and $1.50 costs. On commencement of suit the defendant company was garnished,—the plaintiff being a street-car driver in its employ,—and on July 14, the company paid the amount due Crisp, $11.90, into court, and filed a disclosure, stating that that amount was due plaintiff at the time of the service of the writ of garnishment. Subsequently, the defendant company was garnished four times upon that judgment, and made disclosures each time, and paid the money due him into court. The disclosures contained no statement that Crisp was a householder. On each occasion, Crisp was notified by the paymaster of the defendant company that his pay had been garnished by Pluff in the suit before the justice, within three or four days after the service of the writ, and in time for him to appear before the justice and protect his interest. On March 8, 1892, when the third writ of garnishment was served, Crisp gave written notice to the defendant company that he was a householder. On one occasion, Crisp claims that the paymaster asked him if he was a householder, when he told him that he was; and the paymaster then instructed him that all he had to do was to go to the justice court, and make a demand for his money, and he would get it. The paymaster, however, denies that such conversation occurred. Crisp claims that he called at the justice court, and, it being near the hour of closing, the justice told him to call the next morning, and he would let him know, which, however, he did not do, as he was out of town the following morning. At another time, Mr. Crisp's attorney attempted to appear for him, but this was refused by the justice. Further than this, it is not claimed that Crisp attempted to protect his interests. He now attempts to recover his wages from the defendant company. He had judgment before the justice for $60 damages and $2 costs. Defendant appealed to the circuit court, and on trial there verdict was directed for plaintiff for the same amount. Defendant brings error.

The statute relating to proceedings against garnishees in justice's court (section 8032, being section 2, chap. 276, How. Anno. Stat.), provides: "The person summoned as garnishee, from the time of the service of such summons, shall be deemed to be liable to the plaintiff in such suit to the amount of the property, money, and effects in his hands or possession or under his control or due from him to the defendant in such suit: provided, that when the defendant is a householder having a family, nothing herein contained shall be applicable to any indebtedness of such garnishee to the defendant for the personal labor of such defendant or his family for any amount not exceeding the sum of twenty-five dollars."

Section 8087 provides that "the garnishee may, after the expiration of the time limited by law for an appeal or stay of execution on said judgment, if no appeal has been taken or stay of proceedings put in, pay to the justice before whom the examination was had all money then due and owing by him to the defendant or sufficient to satisfy said judgment (except such is provided by section 2 of this Act), and thereupon such justice shall execute and deliver to the garnishee a release and discharge for the amount laid." The exemption referred to in this section is recited above as a part of section 2.

It is contended by counsel for plaintiff that the defendant might have disclosed all the facts, as such facts had been disclosed by the plaintiff, and that, if it had disclosed the fact of plaintiffs' being a householder, no judgment could have been rendered against the garnishee by the justice; that, the defendant having failed to disclose the fact that the plaintiff was a householder, it cannot now screen itself by the payment of the money into the court, and a release from the justice, if such release had been given.

On the other hand, counsel for defendant contends: (1) That under the law the principal defendant had a perfect right to appear in a garnishment case and protect his own interest. (2) That there is no duty imposed upon a garnishee defendant to investigate the domestic relations of the principal defendant, and determine whether he is a householder having a family. (3) That the question whether the principal defendant in a garnishment case is a householder is a judicial question, and should be determined by the court and not by the garnishee defendant, and that by payment into the court the question is properly placed there for decision.

In these contentions, we think defendant's counsel is correct. In Wilson v. Bartholomew, 45 Mich. 41, it was contended that the principal defendant could not, in his own behalf, by writ of certiorari, prosecute an action to review the judgment given against the garnishee defendant. It was said: "It cannot be maintained that the legal rights of Loomis [the principal defendant] were liable to be cut off by the decision of a justice in a case between others, and without his having an opportunity to be heard."

The principal defendant had the right to be heard before the justice, and show why the fund deposited by the garnishee should not be paid over on a judgment rendered against him. The attorney for the principal defendant attempted to appear, and the justice held that he could not do so. In this the justice was in error, but the remedy of the principal defendant in such case, was by appeal or certiorari. Chilcote v. Conley, 36 Ohio St. 545; Curran v. Fleming, 76 Ga. 98.

In the above cases the rule is stated that the principal defendant may appear and defend in the matter of the garnishment. It is claimed here, however, that it was the duty of the garnishee to have disclosed that the principal defendant was a householder, and that, not having done so, he is liable in the present action. The garnishee complied with the plain intent of the statute. It made disclosure of the amount of its indebtedness to the principal defendant, and paid the money into court. The object of the statute's permitting the payment of money into court is to terminate controversies as to the amount due and owing by the garnishee defendant to the principal defendant, and to release the garnishee from further trouble or annoyance with the matter. Barber v. Howd, 85 Mich. 221.

Having made the disclosure, and paid the money to the justice, its further duty in the premises ended; and the matter then rested between the plaintiff in that suit and the principal defendant, as to how the money was to be applied, and the decision of that question was for the court.

As was said in Karp v. Citizens Nat. Bank of Saginaw, 76 Mich. 679: "The object of the garnishee law is to furnish reasonable facilities for reaching property of the debtor, due him or held for him by third persons; but it was never intended to deprive a garnishee of any of his own rights, or to subject him to double action."

In Moore v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 43 Iowa, 885, the court said: "The whole proceeding being based on the statute, we would hesitate long before holding that there are other and greater obligations or duties resting upon a garnishee than those imposed by statute. The law, as it is, imposes inconvenience enough on a garnishee, without enlarging its provisions by judicial construction. Another cogent reason why it was not the duty of the garnishee to make defense is that the exemption of property and wages from execution or attachment is in the nature of a personal right, to be exercised or claimed by the debtor, and not by another. If he fail to claim the exemption, no one indebted to him would have the right to make it for him.

It certainly would be far from reasonable to require a corporation employing hundreds of men to be familiar with the domestic relations of its employes, as that all its officers upon whom legal service of garnishment might be made should have knowledge that a particular employe was a married man." We think that the true rule is that, an exemption being a purely personal right, the defense must be set up by the principal defendant. The garnishee has no interest in the controversy. He is a neutral party. He makes his disclosure, and pays his money into court. When this is done, the principal defendant then has an opportunity to show to the court that the moneys are exempt and should not be paid over to the plaintiff. That the defense must be set up by the principal defendant is held in Moore v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 43 Iowa, 885; Conley v. Chilcote, 36 Ohio St. 820; Jones v. Tracy, 75 Pa. 417.

The question whether the principal defendant is a married man and a householder is for the justice to determine, under the facts of the case. While it may be proper for the garnishee to disclose the fact, if within his knowledge, yet the claim of exemption must be made by the principal defendant, if he have notice, if he desires to save the right which the statute gives him. In the present case, he knew of the issue of the trial, and had ample opportunity to do so, but neglected it. He cannot now claim that the moneys were improperly paid into court by the garnishee, or insist that the garnishee should have made the defense for him. The garnishee apparently acted in good faith, and should not be compelled to pay the debt twice. Judgment of the court below should be reversed, with costs of both courts, as we see no reason why a new trial should be awarded.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. V. Beach, City Atty., and Whalley, Strahan & Pipes, for appellants:

The legislature merely provided for the doing of future acts by riparian owners, under the regulation of the corporate authorities. It did not in any manner legalize or attempt to legalize wharves theretofore constructed.

NOTE.—The right of riparian owners to build wharves in the absence of constitutional or statutory prohibition is involved in the above decision from which Eisenbach v. Hatfield (Wash.) 12 L. R. Bowlby v. Shively, 22 Or. 410, announces that the state is the absolute owner of the tide lands free from any easement of the upland owner therein and subject only to the paramount right of navigation.

A municipal corporation, authorized by law to improve a street by building on the line thereof a bridge over, or a tunnel under, a navigable river, where it crosses the street, incurs no liability for damages unavoidably caused to adjoining property by obstructing the street or the river, unless such liability be imposed by statute.

Assuming that the land in question has been dedicated for a street, defendants have no right to appropriate and obstruct it with the approach to a bridge. The land in question belongs to the plaintiffs, subject to the public easement, if the land was dedicated, as claimed by defendants; and therefore it cannot be subjected to a new servitude, and one not contemplated by the dedication, without the consent of plaintiffs.

Lord, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity to enjoin the defendants from appropriating to public use a certain strip of land for a bridge abutment and approach thereto without compensation to its owners. The complaint, inter alia, alleges that the plaintiffs are the owners in fee simple and in possession of the lots therein described, having adjacent thereto several warehouses; and also of a strip of land at the foot of Burnside street, 60 feet wide, between Front street and the Willamette river, and of the wharf located thereon, extending to the navigable water of such river; that the defendants, the bridge commission, appointed and acting under the "Meussdorffer Act," propose to construct a bridge across the Willamette river from the intersection of Burnside and North Front streets, in the city of Portland, to a point opposite thereto on the east bank of said river, and have let the contract therefor to the defendant the Bullen Bridge Company, which company is about to commence the work of its construction; that the defendants propose to place the approach to and abutment for the west end of such bridge upon said strip of land, and to appropriate the same to public use, without any compensation to its owners, and without taking any steps to acquire the title, or any right to occupy or use said land; and that, unless restrained, they will proceed with the construction of said bridge, and wholly deprive the plaintiffs of their property without compensation therefor, and also permanently obstruct the use of said wharf, and the extensions thereof north and south of the proposed site of said bridge, to their great and irreparable injury. The answer denies, on information and belief, that the plaintiffs are the owners of said property, and affirmatively alleges as a defense (1) that the strip of land in controversy is a part of Burnside street by virtue of a dedication under certain maps and plats made and filed by John H. Couch between the years 1859 and 1869, showing the extension of said street to the Willamette river; that the said John H. Couch, his wife, Caroline, and these plaintiffs, exhibited the same to intending purchasers, and sold lots and blocks with special reference to such maps and plats; that the locus in quo is a part of the wife's half of the John H. Couch donation land claim, and that his wife, Caroline Couch, after his death, and the plaintiffs, after her death, sold and conveyed to divers persons sundry lots and blocks and parts thereof with particular reference to said plats and maps, and thereby approved and ratified the act of John H. Couch in making and filing the same. And alleges (2) as a further defense that the locus in quo has been constantly used by the public as a street for more than twenty years last past, with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiffs, their ancestors, predecessors, and grantors; and that the public thereby acquired a prescriptive right to use and occupy the same as a street. The reply denies the allegations in the answer, except that the locus in quo is in that half of the donation land claim set apart to Caroline Couch, etc.

From this statement it will be seen that the main questions involved and to be determined are: (1) Has there been a dedication of the locus in quo as a public street? (2) Have the plaintiffs a right to erect and maintain, at the locus in quo, a wharf extending to the navigable water of the Willamette river?

To establish the first proposition the defendants introduced two plats and maps of Couch's addition to the city of Portland. The first one is a lithographic map of Portland, dated 1859, made by S. J. McCormick. It shows that Burnside street extends to the river, and thus includes the strip of land in dispute. The second map was made by John H. Couch on the 22d day of June, 1869, and purports to be an addition to Couch's addition, already laid out. It also shows that Burnside street extends to the river. On the other hand, plaintiffs have introduced two maps of Couch's addition to the city of Portland, one made by John H. Couch in 1863, and the other made by Caroline, his widow, Caroline E. Wilson, Clementine E. Lewis, Elizabeth R. Glisan, May H. Couch, George Flanders, and Maria L. Flanders, on the 15th day of November, 1872. Both of these maps show that Burnside street terminates at the west side of Front street, and that the strip of land in controversy is private property. It thus appears, so far as the maps and plats are concerned, that the two introduced by the defendants show Burnside street extends to the river, while the two introduced by the plaintiffs show that it terminates at the west side of Front street. As to the lithographic map of 1869, there is no evidence to show, nor is it claimed, that John H. Couch or his wife signed or acknowledged or had anything to do with making it.

The point upon which the defendants mainly rely in respect to such map as showing a dedication is that it was in general use in the city, and the only public map referring to Couch's addition from 1859 to 1865, during which time John H. Couch and his wife made certain deeds in which the lots were described by reference to Couch's addition to the city of Portland. It is argued that the reference in these deeds to Couch's addition, under the circumstances, was intended to refer to such addition as platted on said map, and was therefore a recognition of it, and, in legal effect, a dedication of the streets as platted thereon. We are unable to assent to this inference. The admitted facts show that the strip of land in dispute belonged to Caroline Couch as donee of the United States, and that it was conveyed to the plaintiffs Allen & Lewis and Flanders, together with certain lots, some time in 1854, and that they are now the owners and entitled to the possession of it, unless the public has acquired an easement therein as a street. There is some evidence that there was a plat made of an addition to the city of Portland by John H. Couch in April, 1850, but there is nothing to show that the locus in quo was dedicated as a public street therein; and, even if there was, such plat having been made before the donation law was passed, it would not have the effect to constitute a dedication. Any person who should subsequently acquire the title from the government or its grantees had a right to revoke such dedication, and subject the property to his private use. Nor is there any evidence that Couch or his wife, prior to 1859,—the date of the McCormick map,—ever made any map on which the locus in quo was platted as a street. It is probable that after they acquired the title from the United States they may have continued to use such prior map, exhibiting it to intending purchasers, and selling their lots with reference to it; but there is nothing to show that Couch or his wife ever recognized the McCormick map, or that they ever saw it, or knew of its existence. In fact, it does not purport to be a map of Couch's addition to the city of Portland.

In view of these considerations, we do not think that the reference in their deeds to Couch's addition was intended to refer to their property as platted on the McCormick map. It is not this, however, but the map of 1869, upon which the defendants mainly rely as establishing a dedication of the locus in quo as a public street. It is claimed that all of the plaintiffs except Mr. Allen made deeds conveying lots with reference to this map. All that can be said in support of this claim is that these parties made certain deeds, referring therein for description to the map of Couch's addition to the city of Portland. But, inasmuch as Couch had made a map in 1865, upon which the locus in quo was not platted as a part of Burnside street, even if we assume that the map made by him in 1869 platted it as a part of such street, there is nothing to show whether the general reference in those deeds was to the map of 1865 or 1869. Mrs. Couch, during the time that she was the owner of the land in dispute, never made any maps or plats dedicating it as a public street, nor had any of the plaintiffs. The maps and plats made by John H. Couch, after he and his wife had conveyed this land, as already stated, to the plaintiffs Allen & Lewis and Capt. Flanders, would not bind them, unless they accepted and acted upon such maps, and there is no evidence that they accepted and acted upon the map of 1869, other than the mere fact that they made certain deeds in which they described the property by reference to the map of Couch's addition to the city of Portland, which reference was as likely to be to the map of 1865, or to some prior map, of which there was some evidence, as to that of 1869.

It is sought, however, to obviate this objection by showing that some of the deeds conveyed lots and blocks that were for the first time platted on the map of 1869, or, in other words, that such deeds conveyed lots and blocks that appear on no other map; and hence it is argued that the reference in them was necessarily to the map of 1869 which, it is claimed, shows that the property in dispute was a part of Burnside street. It is true that such lots and blocks did not appear on any other map, for the reason that the map of 1869 was intended as an addition or extension of prior maps; but this affords no justification for the assumption or argument that such map, made by John H. Couch, shows a dedication of the locus in quo as a public street. Before, however, it can be assumed that his wife recognized the map of 1869 by joining with her husband in such deeds, as showing a dedication of her property, so as to bind or estop her, such map itself ought to show the dedication so distinctly and positively as to make the evidence of her intention to divest herself of the title entirely clear. The map itself does not purport to be anything more than a map of the extension of Couch's addition to the city of Portland. The lots and blocks laid out on it, which constitute the new addition, are designated and marked by a coloring of yellow, and all the other property except a tier of blocks adjoining such yellow portion, is left blank. This indicates that the map of 1869 was not intended to affect the prior maps. Its object was to plat a second addition, and to show its relative position to the first one. The numbering of the lots and blocks and the dedication of the streets outside of the extension were to remain as platted on the prior maps. This must be so, as it is impossible to convey any lots or blocks by reference to such map, outside of the extension, because they are left in blank.

and hence deeds referring to lots and blocks as numbered by the map of 1869 necessarily referred to it, and did not appear on any other map, because such lots and blocks composed the new addition or extension of prior plats; but, as we have shown, the other portion of such map negatives the idea that it was intended to change the map of 1865, or prior maps, or that it undertook to represent the locus in quo as a part of Burnside street.

This view is confirmed by the form of acknowledgment to this map, which reads, in its material parts, as follows: "That he recognized the accompanying diagram or plat as a true and correct description of lots and blocks laid out by him as an addition to the city of Portland." This, of course, means the lots and blocks laid out on this map as a new addition, indicating that the added blocks copied from prior maps were only intended to show their relative position to such new addition, and not to alter or affect the prior maps. We do not think, therefore, that any representations as to Burnside street upon that portion of the map left in blank—such portion constituting no part of the addition—can be construed as intending to make a dedication of the locus in quo to affect the prior maps.

The map of 1872 is the only one that Caroline Couch or the plaintiffs ever signed, and it shows that the property in question is not a part of Burnside street. This map corresponds with that of 1865, and, as we construe it, is not in conflict with the map of 1869. We do not think, therefore, that such deeds as were made of lots and blocks which appear only in the map of 1869 were a dedication of the locus in quo, or that they can be reasonably construed to be a recognition of any dedication thereof. In thus holding we do not controvert the principle that where a proprietor recognizes a plat in making a sale of lots he will be estopped to deny a dedication of the streets designated upon the plat embracing his property; but we do not think, in view of the facts, that such principle can be applied to the case at bar.

The second defense is dedication by user. It is claimed by the defendants that the locus in quo has been used by the public, with the consent of the plaintiffs, the same as other streets similarly situated have been used, for more than twenty years, and that therefore, the public have a prescriptive right to the same. A dedication of land to the public use rests on the intention or assent of the owner. As it is purely a question of intention, the evidence of it, when resting in parol, must be clear and satisfactory, and indicate a positive and unmistakable intention to devote the property to public use. All the authorities agree that the acts and conduct of the owner, when relied upon to show the dedication of his property, must be deliberate and unequivocal, manifesting a clear intention to abandon such property to the public use. The burden of showing it rests on the defendant. The security of titles requires that the evidence of dedication, when depending on parol proof, should be of such a deliberate and decisive character as to leave no doubt of the owners' intention. Hence the 22 L. R. A.

rule is well settled by numerous authorities that before there can be a valid dedication there must have been an actual intention, clearly indicated, by deliberate and unequivocal words or acts, to dedicate the property to the public. Hogus v. Albina, 20 Or. 185, 10 L. R. A. 673.

It appears from the testimony that some time in 1854, and soon after the plaintiffs Capt. Flanders and Allen & Lewis bought the property, they built a wharf in front thereof for ocean vessels and river craft; that it was one of the first wharves built in the city, and for many years was the principal landing for such vessels; that it has been maintained there continuously ever since, although it has been rebuilt several times, and extensions added. The wharf extends across the locus in quo, and out from the bank of the river about 100 feet to the navigable water of such river, and is 700 feet in length. A roadway or street was left open from the east side of Front street to the wharf, for the purpose of ingress and egress. The wharf opposite the street is two-story, and at the time it was built the plaintiffs last mentioned constructed an elevated passageway 20 feet wide on the north side of this roadway, from Front street to the upper story, and inclosed the space underneath, and used it for a stable and storehouse. This roadway or street has been used by the public and plaintiffs as a means of conducting and carrying on the business appertaining to this wharf and warehouse, and the facts indicate that it has not been used for any other purpose. The plaintiffs have at all times maintained their right to the locus in quo, consistent with its use as a passage or roadway to and from their wharf, and the use of it by the public for such purpose was not under a claim of right, but by their permission. The city authorities have not exercised any acts of ownership over or assumed any right to control it; nor has the city made any improvements or performed any work upon the same by way of repairs or otherwise, but the evidence shows that the plaintiffs have used and occupied such property to the exclusion of the public, except so far as was necessary for the public to use it in doing business at their wharf. The evidence also shows that the plaintiffs have asserted their ownership of the land in controversy by acts and declarations which are entirely inconsistent with any intention to abandon or dedicate it to the public use. They have used it for the storage of iron, brick, and other heavy freight; they have improved and repaired it; they have kept a gate across it for ten or twelve years; exercised the right to exclude persons or teams from it whenever they chose to do so; they have publicly and repeatedly, in connection with the use of the property, declared that it was not a public street, but a private way to their wharf and warehouse.

In Irwin v. Dixon, 50 U. S. 9 How. 10, 18 L. ed. 25, in which the facts are similar to the case at bar, the court says: "From the very nature of wharf property, likewise, the access must be kept open for convenience of the owner and his customers; but no one ever supposed that the property thereby became public, instead of private. . . . No length of time during which property is so used can deprive an owner of his title. . . . While any one might be allowed to travel over this space from the warehouse to the wharf and river, when convenient, and not interfering with the owner, it would not be because it had been intended to give to the public a right of way over these premises, but because he himself intended to travel over it, and while so doing and so leaving it open, would not be captious in preventing others from traveling there."

The same principle is laid down in the note to Dovaston v. Payne, 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. Hare & W's note, p. 155, wherein it is said: "If, therefore, a person opens and uses a space upon his own land as a road for his own convenience and purposes, the mere fact that the community are allowed to make use of it in common with him for even twenty or thirty years will not constitute a dedication of it to the public use, especially in the face of declarations on his part inconsistent with an assent to such dedication." So that the use of the locus in quo by the public in the manner referred to is entirely consistent with the ownership of the plaintiffs, and therefore the public have not acquired a prescriptive right by user to the land in controversy.

The next question to be determined is as to the right of the plaintiffs to erect and maintain a wharf at the locus in quo extending to the navigable water of the Willamette river. The contention for the defendants is that the title to the soil under the Willamette river is in the state by virtue of its sovereignty, and that riparian owners, without a license or grant from the state, have no authority or right to maintain a wharf beyond the ordinary high-water mark. Hence they claim that if the plaintiffs have erected their wharf and extended it over the submerged soil of such river to its navigable waters without any license from the state, they have erected a purpresture, which may be abated or removed as a common nuisance. The theory of their argument is that in this country the law as to navigable fresh waters is the same as to waters moved by the tide; that, in either case, the state, by virtue of its sovereignty, is the owner of the subjacent soil of its navigable rivers, including tide lands or submerged lands contiguous to deep water; that, as such owner, it has the right to regulate the use of such lands, or to dispose of them, in any way that will not impair or injuriously affect the public interests in such rivers, especially for purposes of navigation and commerce, free from any easement of the upland owners, who can only acquire the right to extend a wharf over them by its consent, obtained by legislation, or acquired by acquiescence through local usage; and that, as a consequence, unless the plaintiffs, as riparian owners, have obtained the consent of the state to extend their wharf over the submerged soil of the Willamette river to the point of its navigability, they cannot be considered as having any right in the premises which the state is bound to respect; nor can their wharf be recognized as a legal structure, the taking or condemnation of which for a public use would entitle them to compensation as for private property.

By the common law, in England, the title to the shore of the sea, and the arms of the sea, and the soil under tide water, is vested in the king, who has a proprietary interest therein, which he may grant or dispose of subject to the public use for navigation and commerce. "The jus privatum," says Lord Hall, "that is acquired by the subject, either by patent or prescription, must not prejudice the jus publicum, wherewith public rivers and the arms of the sea are affected to the public use." De Jure Maris, 22. The soil so vested in the king can only be transferred subject to the public trust.

In this country the state has succeeded to the ownership and sovereignty over such lands, charged with a like public trust; and the law is now regarded as settled that the state, by virtue of its sovereignty, is regarded as the owner of lands covered by tide waters, and, as an incident of such ownership, has the right to use or dispose of them in such way as will not impair or prejudice the public interests or privileges such as fishing, navigation, and commerce. As touching this subject, Mr. Justice Field said: "Upon the admission of California into the Union upon equal footing with the original states, absolute property in and dominion and sovereignty over all soils under the tide waters within her limits passed to the state, with the consequent right to dispose of the title to any part of said soils in such manner as she might deem proper, subject only to the paramount right of navigation over the waters, so far as such navigation might be required by the necessities of commerce with foreign nations or among the several states, the regulation of which was vested in the general government." Weber v. State Harbor Comrs. 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 65, 21 L. ed. 801.

And in Boulby v. Shively, 22 Or. 410, in conformity with our previous adjudications, it was held that when the state of Oregon was admitted into the Union the tide lands became its property, and subject to its jurisdiction and disposal; that, in the absence of legislation or usage, the common-law rule would govern the rights of upland proprietors, and by that law the title to such lands is in the state; that the state has the right to use or dispose of its title in such manner as it might deem best, free from any easement of such upland owners therein other than such as the state might choose to resign to them, subject only to the paramount right of navigation and the uses of commerce. The same rule has been extended to our great fresh-water lakes, which, owing to the extended commerce conducted upon them, are treated as inland seas; and also, in some of the states, to the great fresh-water rivers, which are navigable in fact, as the Mississippi, the Missouri, the Ohio, and, in the state of Pennsylvania, to all its permanent rivers; such rule depending on the law of each state as to what waters, and to what extent, the prerogative of the state over the lands under water shall be exercised. The question, as Mr. Justice Bradley said, is one for the several states themselves to determine. "If they choose to resign to the riparian proprietor rights which properly belonged to them in their sovereign capacity. It is not for others to raise objections." Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 324, 24 L. ed. 324.

So it appears that the same rule as to the ownership of and the sovereignty over lands under the navigable waters of the great lakes and fresh-water rivers applies which obtains at common law as to the ownership of and sovereignty over lands under tide waters, and that such lands are held by the same right in the one case as the other, and subject to the same trusts and limitations. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Illinois, 146 U. S. 436, 36 L. ed. 1037.

In respect to the tide lands, the state, as owner, has provided by legislation for their sale and disposal free from any right of the upland owners therein, except such as it saw fit to recognize in them or their grantees, in consideration of the fact that prior to such legislation the tide lands had often been dealt with by the adjacent owners as private property, subject, however, to the paramount right of navigation and the uses of commerce. Bowditch v. Shively, supra.

But in respect to navigable fresh-water rivers in this state there has been no legislation for the sale or disposal of any portion of the submerged lands lying between the upland and navigable waters. Such lands, so far as any legislative action is concerned, have not been treated by the state in the proprietary way which it has asserted and applied to the tide lands; and some of the decisions of its courts recognize certain rights in the riparian owners, arising from adjacency, which do not belong to them in common with the public.

In Minto v. Delaney, 7 Or. 337, it was held that the river is the boundary of lands lying along the Willamette, and that accretions formed on the shore by the gradual receding of the water belong to the riparian owner; and in Moore v. Willamette Transp. & Locks Co., Id. 357, that rocks and shoals along the margin of the same river belong to the riparian owner. While, therefore, the state, as the owner of the submerged lands of navigable fresh-water rivers, has not treated its proprietary interest in any portion of them as subject to sale or disposal, it has recognized certain rights in the riparian owners, not common to the public, in the shoal water in front of their land. It is common knowledge that before and after the state was admitted into the Union the riparian owners along the navigable fresh-water streams within its limits acted on the assumption that the right of wharfage was incident to their land, and built wharves in front thereof. Some of these wharves, like the plaintiff's are expensive structures, and of great advantage and benefit to commerce. Nor is this all. Upon the tidal waters, such owners, believing that the tide lands adjacent to their uplands belonged to them, built wharves over the same, and dealt with them as private property. This condition of things was recognized in the legislation referred to; and in consideration thereof, and as an act of justice, a preference was given to the riparian owners in the provisions for the sale of such lands. "Though the state was under no legal obligation to recognize the rights of either the riparian owner or those who had occupied these tide lands," as Boies, J., said, "still the legislature, considering the fact that these lands had been dealt with as private property, and improved sometimes by the erection of expensive structures, which were a great advantage to commerce, made what we think wise and just provisions for the protection of those who had spent their money in purchasing and improving these lands, which improvements were in many cases absolutely necessary as aids to commerce." Parker v. Rogers, 8 Or. 190.

All this goes to show that the custom which obtained of building wharves along the navigable rivers of the state by riparian owners was fully understood, and that there was no intention to interfere or obstruct the right to wharf across the submerged lands of nontidal or fresh-water rivers but that the act was only designed to provide for the sale of tide lands on tidal waters, the effect of which was inconsistent with any easement or right of the upland owner therein not granted to him in such act. This becomes all the more apparent by the proviso in the tide-land act, which provides "that the Willamette, Coquille and Coos rivers shall not be deemed rivers in which the tide ebbs and flows, within the meaning of this act, . . . and that the title of this state to any tide or overflowed lands upon said rivers is hereby granted and confirmed to such owner of the adjacent lands." This grant conveyed the title to all of such lands along these rivers, whether tide or overflowed, to the riparian owners, subject to the public trust. As the Willamette is a fresh-water river, and only slightly affected by the tides a short distance from its mouth, there is no tide land at Portland, as held in Andrus v. Knott, 12 Or. 501; and therefore it results that if the submerged or overflowed lands described in the act include such as are not affected by the tides, and lie between the upland and navigable water, they belong to such owners, subject to the paramount right of navigation and commerce.

There is a marked distinction made by such legislation between the submerged lands of fresh navigable waters, and those covered by the flux and reflux of the tide, and known as tide lands. In view of these considerations, and the tendency of our adjudications to recognize rights in the riparian owners on the Willamette river that do not belong to the public, and the custom which has prevailed from the early settlement of the country in respect to the building of wharves, it is at least reasonable to infer that the state has acquiesced in the right of the riparian owners to build wharves in aid of navigation. In fact, the absence of legislation in respect to the state's proprietary interest in the shoal water of submerged lands of the Willamette river, taken in connection with the legislation providing for the sale and disposal of tide lands, and adjudications to the effect that the grant of its proprietary interest therein is free from any easement of the ri-riparian owner, and subject only to the public right of navigation and commerce, leads to the conclusion that it is the policy of the state, as in other states, to allow riparian owners on such rivers to build wharves in aid of navigation.

Mr. Gould says: "Riparian owners upon navigable fresh rivers and lakes may construct, in shoal water in front of their land, wharves, piers, landings, and booms in aid of and not obstructing navigation. This is a riparian right, being dependent upon title to the bank, and not upon title to the river bed. Its exercise may be regulated or prohibited by the state; but so long as it is not prohibited it is a private right derived from the passive or implied license by the public. As it does not depend upon title to the soil under water, it is equally valid in the states in which the river beds are held to be public property and in those in which they are held to belong to the riparian proprietors, usque ad flum aqua." Again, he says: "The legislature may authorize the extension of such structures beyond low-water mark, but, if not sanctioned by the legislature, they are illegal, so far as to interfere with or limit the right of navigation." Gould, Waters, § 176. In view of these considerations, the wharf of plaintiffs, being in aid of navigation, is a legal structure, and private property, which can only be taken for public use according to established law, and with due compensation therefor.

Passing these considerations for the present, there is another phase of the case, which seems to be decisive of the assent of the state to the building of plaintiffs' wharf. The legislative assembly, at its session held in 1862, passed the following act relating to wharves in cities: "Sec. 4227. The owners of any land in this state lying upon any navigable stream or other like water, and within the corporate limits of any incorporate town therein, are hereby authorized to construct a wharf or wharves upon the same, and extend such wharf or wharves into such stream or other like water beyond low-water mark so far as may be necessary and convenient for the use and accommodation of any ships or other boats or vessels that may or can navigate such stream or other like water. Sec. 4228. The corporate authorities of the town wherein such wharf or wharves is proposed to be constructed shall have power to regulate the exercise of the privilege of franchise herein granted; and upon the application of the person entitled to and desiring to construct such wharf or wharves, such corporate authority shall, by ordinance or other like mode, prescribe the mode and extent to which the same may be exercised beyond the line of low-water mark, so that such wharf or wharves shall not be constructed any further into such stream or other water beyond such low-water line than may be necessary and convenient for the purpose expressed in section 4227, and so that the same will not unnecessarily interfere with the navigation of such stream or other like water." Hill's Code.

In 1869, the city of Portland, under the authority of this statute, passed an ordinance 22 L. R. A.

defining the wharf limits and regulating the building of the same. Section 8 of this ordinance provides that "all wharves and piles now erected or driven beyond the lines described in section 1 of this ordinance shall be removed to conform to the above-described line, within ten years from the date of the approval of this ordinance. Provided, that if any such wharf or structure shall be at any time destroyed by the elements, or so damaged as to necessitate the rebuilding thereof, it shall be rebuilt to conform to said above-described lines."

The contention for the defendants is that the plaintiffs' wharf, having been built when the statute was passed, did not come within its purview; that the statute provides for the doing of future acts under the regulation of the corporate authorities; that it does not legalize or attempt to legalize wharves theretofore constructed; that the words "proposed to be constructed," and "desiring to construct," and "hereby authorized to construct," show beyond cavil that future, and not past, erections were what the law-makers had in mind.

The rule undoubtedly is that a statute is to be construed to operate prospectively, and not retrospectively, unless the language is so plain and direct as to preclude all question as to the intention of the legislature. The rule is founded on the principle that a construction should not be given to a statute that will take away or restrict rights, unless the intention of the legislature cannot be otherwise satisfied. A retrospective law is always subject to the limitation that it shall not be such as is termed "ex post facto," or as impair the obligations of contracts.

But we do not think there is any occasion to apply the principle suggested to the statute in question. There is no claim that it affects past transactions, or relates back, and gives them validity. It is not pretended that the statute has a retroactive effect, and made wharves legal structures which were erected prior to its enactment. The statute neither commands certain acts or things to be done, nor prohibits them from being done. It is a permissive statute, which allows certain things to be done without commanding them. "Under the provision of the statute," said Boise, J., "any person within an incorporated town within this state may build and maintain a wharf from his land at high water into navigable water, so far as is necessary or convenient to accommodate shipping, if he conforms to the legal restrictions imposed on him by the authorities of the town, and does not impede navigation. Such structures are erected in all commercial towns, and have been recognized as legal structures in all the states." Parker v. Taylor, 7 Or. 446.

The statute simply grants permission or license to any upland owner in an incorporated town whose land fronts upon a navigable stream to construct a wharf in front of his land, which permission, when acted upon, renders his wharf a legal structure. Its object is to encourage the building of wharves to aid navigation, and for the benefit of commerce. Within its purport, then, what difference would it make whether the wharf wa built before or after the statute was enacted. In either case, the wharf would serve the object it sought to accomplish, and hence be a legal structure within its spirit and intent. But it is argued that the leave granted under the statute, being merely a permission or license, is revocable at the pleasure of the state; and that, as a consequence, the wharf of the plaintiff ceases to be a legal structure, or to have a legal existence, when the leave is withdrawn, or the license revoked. The statute has not been repealed, either directly or by implication, and, so far as it is concerned, there is no revocation of the license granted. The most that has been claimed for the Meussdorffer act in that connection is that it—being for a public purpose—operates to revoke the license of the plaintiffs, and thereby to deprive their wharf of its legal foundation and existence. It will be observed, then, that the argument is based on the theory that the permission granted by the statute to build wharves is merely a license, and, as such, may be revoked at the pleasure of the state, after it has been acted upon, and the wharf erected. But this is not so.

As was said in Bowley v. Shively, supra, the statute does not vest any right until exercised. It is a license revocable at the pleasure of the legislature until acted upon and availed of. It is doubtless true that, if the statute should be repealed, or the adjacent tide lands disposed of, the privilege given the upland owner to build a wharf across the tide lands into deep water, unless acted upon or availed of, would be revoked. But the riparian owners who have taken advantage of the permission or privilege to build wharves—especially those on fresh navigable waters, for the reasons suggested—have acquired rights that would not be affected by the repeal of the statute. These wharves are legal structures, and as such are private property, which cannot be taken without due process of law, and due compensation therefor. Hence the contention of the defendants that the Meussdorffer act—which authorizes the location and construction of the Burnside street bridge, and under which they are proceeding to build it—is a revocation of the leave or license, cannot be maintained.

Nor do we find anything in the case of Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Illinois, supra, in conflict with this result. There the grant of the submerged soil of the lake was in such quantity as, in the opinion of the court, impaired the public interest in its waters, and operated, if irrevocable, as an abdication by the state of its trust over the property. The right of a riparian owner to build a wharf over the submerged soil of a river to navigable water is not inconsistent with the public interest, nor in prejudice of the public rights. Nor does the grant of such subjacent soil or tide lands subject to the paramount right of navigation and commerce authorize its use for any purpose inconsistent with the public interest. The land in front of the riparian owner, when used for a wharf, and under proper regulation, is in aid of navigation, and for the benefit of commerce. Of course, the state has the right to regulate the building of wharves, or to determine how far rights in submerged soil can be exercised consistently with the easement of navigation. Our state has made such regulations, and, as there is no claim that the wharf of the plaintiffs impedes navigation, or is not erected in conformity with its requirements, it must be regarded as a legal structure, and entitled to be protected as private property. Although the evidence shows that the original wharf was torn down and rebuilt in the year 1876, in conformity with the ordinance, we have not deemed it necessary to refer to that fact as strengthening the right of the plaintiffs in the premises. Within the principle and for the reasons suggested, it is apparent that the cases of Runde v. Delaware & R. Canal Co. 55 U. S. 14 How. 80, 14 L. ed. 335; Monongahela Nav. Co. v. Coons, 6 Watts & S. 101; Susquehanna Canal Co. v. Wright, 9 Watts & S. 9, 42 Am. Dec. 312,—do not determine the questions involved in the case at bar. The right to build and maintain a wharf, being in aid of navigation, and for the benefits of commerce, rests on a different footing and principle than a license to erect mills with dams which may impede or obstruct navigation, or canals diverting the waters of a navigable river.

Without further reference, it is sufficient to say that we think the plaintiffs have a right of property in their wharf of which they cannot be deprived except in accordance with established law, and, if it should be necessary that it should be taken or destroyed for the use of the bridge, that it cannot be done without due compensation therefor. Monongahela Nav. Co. v. United States, 148 U. S. 312, 37 L. ed. 463.

The decree must be affirmed.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

STATE of New Hampshire

v.

Frank C. ALMY.

(.....N. H.....)

The constitutional right of trial by jury is not violated by a statute which provides

NOTE.—The opinion and briefs in the above case seem to exhaust the authorities on the subject and leave no opportunity to add anything of value to the question.

for the determination by the court of the degree of crime on a plea of guilty of murder.

(July 29, 1892.)

CASE RESERVED by the trial term for Grafton County for the opinion of the full court of a motion for a new trial after judgment of the court fixing the degree of the crime without granting a jury trial after plea of guilty to an indictment for murder.

Denied.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Alvin Burleigh and Joseph C. Story, for defendant, in support of the motion:

The defendant has a constitutional right to a trial by jury on the plea of guilty. The plea raises the issue of degree of guilt upon which the life of the accused depends.

The plea of guilty under the statutes of this state, since murder was divided into two degrees in 1836, is a confession of intentional, unlawful killing and nothing more. It is not a plea of guilty to a capital offense.

No judgment can be rendered upon such a plea. The plea raises as sharp an issue as any plea could possibly raise.

The Statute of 23 Hen. VIII., created the distinction between killing with malice prepense, which was still called murder, and without malice prepense which was called manslaughter. To the first-named offense the death penalty still attached, but manslaughter entailed imprisonment only.

State v. Pike, 49 N. H. 399, 6 Am. Rep. 538; 4 Bl. Com. 190; Hale, P. C. 466; 1 East, P. C. 218; Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 304, 52 Am. Dec. 711.

The state seeks to attach the same meaning to a plea of guilty under an indictment for murder in New Hampshire that obtained at common law, when no degrees, with different penalties attached, were recognized, and there seems to be a similar confusion of mind in some of the judicial opinions of courts in different states.

After the Statute of 23 Hen. VIII., intentional killing in hot blood or from sudden and uncontrollable passion was manslaughter. The accused could truthfully plead guilty to that offense and be sentenced to imprisonment. Under our statute intentional killing without deliberation and premeditation is not manslaughter.

Gen. Laws, chap. 282, § 7.

Manslaughter by the Statute of 23 Hen. VIII., was the same as murder in the second degree now is under our law.

Gen. Laws, chap. 282, § 1.

As the forms of indictment for murder do not in terms set up the particular degree of that crime the accused cannot as a matter of right plead guilty of the lower degree and be sentenced accordingly.

He cannot plead guilty of the actual offense committed and receive the known penalty of imprisonment, but must subject himself to the chances of a trial by the court on the question as to whether or not his neck shall be stretched unless he pleads not guilty, and yet, in view of this critical situation in which the law places the accused, the state contends that his plea of guilty leaves no issue to be tried. Such a position is contradictory. It is the right of a prisoner, competent in understanding and acting in good faith, to plead guilty instead of denying the charge.

Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 795.

The legislature cannot by indirection nor by taking several steps deprive the accused of a constitutional right which cannot directly and by a single step be taken from him.

A general plea of guilty to an indictment for murder which does not designate in terms or apt language the degree, is either held equivalent to a plea of not guilty to the higher degree or to a confession of guilt to the lower degree only.

Whart. Hom. 2d ed. § 194.

A general verdict of guilty is not a finding of guilt in the first degree.

In order to make the killing murder in the first degree, deliberation and premeditation must be proved, they will not be inferred from the killing, whether it be proved or confessed.

That the common-law form of indictment for murder is sufficient to support a verdict of guilty in the first degree, under laws dividing murder into degrees, is combated in an argument of great force and learning by Mr. Bishop in his work on Criminal Procedure, §§ 567, 588.

Almy was found guilty of murder in the first degree, not on his own confession, by "the judgment of his peers," by "due process of law," or "the law of the land," but by the judgment of two men sitting as a court. This was in derogation of both federal and state constitutions.

"Due process of law" and "the law of the land" mean one and the same thing.

Mayo v. Wilson, 1 N. H. 55.

The judgment of his peers means trial by a jury of twelve men according to the course of the common law.

2 Kent, Com. p. 18, and note.

The law of the land means due process of law in which is included the right to contest the charge.

Greene v. Briggs, 1 Curt. C. C. 311; Taylor v. Porter, 4 Hill, 140, 40 Am. Dec. 274; Parsons v. Russell, 11 Mich. 113, 83 Am. Dec. 728; Jones v. Robbins, 8 Gray, 342.

These terms do not mean all statutory enactments of the legislature, the law-making branch of the government cannot make "due process of law" by violating the ancient and fundamental principles of justice, liberty, and protection, which are embodied in the old common law of our ancestors.

East Kingston v. Twiss, 48 N. H. 61.

In discussing the term "the law of the land" the court says in Saco v. Wentworth, 37 Me. 171, 58 Am. Dec. 786: "It does not mean an act of the legislature; if such was the true construction, this branch of the government could at any time take away life, liberty, property, and privilege without a trial by jury."

A constitutional jury cannot consist of less than twelve men.

It is the right of a trial by jury which exists and is preserved.

Speaking of the danger of legislative encroachments upon constitutional rights in connection with the term "the law of the land" (Jones v. Robbins, 8 Gray, 342), the court says, in objection to the claim, that this language meant statutory enactments of the broadest kind.

Article 16 of the Bill of Rights provides that "no subject shall be liable," etc.; "nor shall the legislature make any law that shall subject any person to a capital punishment (excepting for the government of the army and navy and the militia in actual service) without trial by jury."

A trial is "the examination before a competent tribunal, according to the laws of the land, of the facts put in issue in a cause for the purpose of determining such issue."

Trial by jury in a capital case is safely within the domain of rights that cannot be waived.

Messrs. Edwin G. Eastman, Atty-Gen., and William H. Mitchell, solicitor for Grafton county, for the state:

The defendant has no constitutional right to a jury trial on his plea of guilty.

The statute in regard to degree of murder creates no new offense, and makes no change in the common-law definition of murder. It merely mitigates the punishment in certain cases, and the mitigation of punishment on a plea of guilty is not made a question for the jury by the common law, or the statute of the constitution.

Opinion of the Justices, 9 Allen, 586; Green v. Com. 12 Allen, 155.

It is constitutional and legal for a guilty man to tell the truth and confess his guilt, and it is constitutional and legal for this court to believe him, and render judgment on his confession.

A defendant in a criminal action, with the consent of the state and the court, may waive a statute enacted for his benefit.

State v. Kaufman, 51 Iowa, 578, 83 Am. Rep. 148; State v. Worden, 46 Conn. 849, 33 Am. Rep. 27.

It is difficult to see why a defendant may not with the consent of the court and state elect to be tried by the court.

Com. v. Dailey, supra; Murphy v. Com. 1 Met. (Ky.) 865; Tyra v. Com. 2 Met. (Ky.) 1.

In cases not capital it has been held that the disqualification of a juror may be waived and that by consent a verdict may be rendered by eleven jurors.

Com. v. Dailey, supra.

In Ohio, a statute defining the jurisdiction and regulating the practice of probate courts, which provides that upon a plea other than a plea of guilty, if the defendant do not demand a trial by jury the probate judge shall proceed to try the issue, was held to be no infringement of the constitution.

Dailey v. State, 4 Ohio St. 57; Dillingham v. State, 5 Ohio St. 280; Ward v. People, 30 Mich. 116.

Upon the question as to the right of one charged with crime to waive a trial by jury, and elect to be tried by the court when there is positive legislative enactment giving the right so to do and conferring power upon the court to try the accused in such a case, there are but few decisions. But fortunately some of the states have passed laws permitting this to be done, and we are therefore not entirely without authorities. And so far as we can learn in every case where a question has been raised the statute empowering the court to try, and the accused to waive a jury trial and elect to be tried by the court, has been decided constitutional.

Dailey v. State and Dillingham v. State, supra; State v. Maine, 27 Conn. 281; Curtis v. Gill, 34 Conn. 54; State v. Tuller, 34 Conn. 295; People v. Smith, 9 Mich. 199; Tabor v. Cook, 15 Mich. 322; Ward v. People, 30 Mich. 116; Com. v. Dailey, 12 Cush. 80; Bank of Columbia v. Okely, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 235, 4 L. ed. 559; People v. Goodwin, 5 Wend. 251; Neales v. Tillotson, 24 Wend. 839, 35 Am. Dec. 624; Detmold v. Drake, 46 N. Y. 318.

The prisoner may even waive his right to a trial at the hands of a jury on the merits, by pleading guilty.

People v. Rathbun, 21 Wend. 509.

There are two answers to the claim that the state had an interest in the defendant's life and a right to have him tried by jury, and that he could not waive the state's right.

The right of jury trial was his exclusive right.

State v. Albee, 61 N. H. 423, 60 Am. Rep. 325; Wooster v. Plymouth, 62 N. H. 196.

If the defendant's right to a jury trial was also the right of the state, the Act of 1886 was a waiver of it.

State v. Worden, 46 Conn. 859, 33 Am. Rep. 37; Cooley, Const. Lim. 392.

A statute can be worded so as to exclude the jurisdiction of a court without a jury.

State v. Carman, 63 Iowa, 180, 50 Am. Rep. 741.

Many of the incidents of a common-law trial by jury are essential elements of the right. The jury must be indifferent, and must be summoned from the vicinage.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 392.

If the constitution deprived defendants of their right of waiver, they could waive none of the elements of a jury trial. They could waive no privilege secured to them by the constitution. As a result the bill of rights would be a bill of disabilities, inflicted upon accused persons presumed to be innocent, and their liberties and lives might be sacrificed by what was intended for their protection. For example, this defendant could not waive the right to be tried in Grafton county.

State v. Albee, supra.

He could not waive his right to refuse to furnish evidence against himself, and the hearing would be illegal and the judgment invalid because he testified that he was guilty of murder, though without premeditation.

State v. Ober, 52 N. H. 459, 18 Am. Rep. 68; Connors v. People, 50 N. Y. 240; People v. Casey, 72 N. Y. 398; Com. v. Mullen, 97 Mass. 545; State v. Witham, 72 Me. 581.

The statute in question creates no new offense.

State v. Pike, 49 N. H. 405, 6 Am. Rep. 533.

The determination of the degree of murder by the court is not a trial.

People v. Noll, 20 Cal. 164; Craig v. State, 16 L. R. A. 358, 49 Ohio St. 415.

Defendant by pleading guilty waived his right to trial by jury.

People v. Lennox, 87 Cal. 118.

Where a statute authorizes the court to try without jury with defendant's consent, defendant thereby waives his right to trial by jury.

Mullen*, 97 Mass. 545; Lord v. State, 18 N. H. 178.

Blodgett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In criminal proceedings a confession of the offense by the party charged by a plea of guilty is the highest kind of conviction of which the case admits (2 Hawk. P. C. chap. 81, § 1; 2 Hale, P. C. 225; 4 Bl. Com. 363); and subjects him precisely to the same punishment as if he were tried and found guilty by verdict (1 Archbold, Crim. Pr. & Pl. *110); and the effect of a confession being to supply the want of evidence (King v. Hall, 1 T. R. 390), it is an admission of every material fact well pleaded in the indictment, and authorizes the court having jurisdiction of the offense to proceed to judgment (4 Bl. Com. 329; 1 Chitty, Crim. L. 429; 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. 795). "Of judgments in criminal cases there are two kinds—First, such as are fixed and stated, and always the same for the same species of crime; secondly, such as are discretionary and variable, according to the different circumstances of each case. . . . The judgment against a man or woman for felony of death hath always been the same since the reign of Hen. I., viz., that he or she be hanged by the neck till dead. . . . As to judgments . . . which are discretionary and variable, according to different circumstances, I shall observe, in general, that for crimes of an infamous nature . . . it seems to be in great measure left to the prudence of the court to inflict such corporal punishment, and also such fine and lien to the good behavior for a certain time, etc., as shall seem most proper and adequate to the offense, from the consideration of the baseness, enormity, and dangerous tendency of it, the malice, deliberation, and willfulness, or the inconsideration, suddenness, and surprise with which it was committed, the age . . . of the offender, and all other circumstances which may any way aggravate or extenuate the guilt." 2 Hawk. P. C. chap. 48, §§ 1, 7, 14.

Prior to 1837 degrees of murder were unknown in this state, and, upon conviction, the invariable judgment was death. In that year, by the legislative act of January 13, which has since been in force, the crime of murder was divided into two degrees, and transferred from the first class of crimes, in which the judgment is invariable, to the second class, in which the judgment is variable. It was recognized as a crime of different grades of enormity, deserving different penalties, and so the punishment was made more or less severe, according to certain aggravating or extenuating circumstances. See note, State v. Dowd, 19 Conn. 391. But the act did not create any new offense, or change the definition of murder as it was understood at common law. It merely mitigated the punishment in certain cases not of the most aggravated nature; and hence an indictment alleging murder in the same form as at common law will support a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree under the act. Com. v. Desmariseau, 16 Gray, 1; State v. Pike, 49 N. H. 399, 405, 6 Am. Rep. 538, and authorities cited; Craig v. State, 49 Ohio St. 415; 16 L. R. A. 558. Such an indictment "sets forth . . . the highest grade of homicide, murder in the first degree, and thereby includes the inferior grade of murder in the second degree, in like manner as an indictment for murder at common law embraces a charge of manslaughter, which is comprehended in the allegations necessary to charge the higher offense. The only difference in the two cases is that in the latter the indictment charges two distinct offenses, but in the former, as applied to degrees of murder, only one offense is charged, but in such form that it includes the higher as well as the lower grade, to which different punishments are attached." Green v. Com. 12 Allen, 155, 178. Neither did the act make any change in the effect of a plea of guilty. It still confesses everything that is duly set forth, as a plea of not guilty puts in issue every fact which is comprehended within the averments of the indictment. When, therefore, this defendant pleaded guilty to the indictment charging upon him, in common-law form, killing with deliberate and premeditated malice, his plea was a confession that he was guilty of the common-law crime of murder, which the statute has not altered, and but for which a judgment of death would have been imperatively required; for, while the statute in no way detracts from the force or effect of the plea, it makes it the duty of the court to ascertain before judgment whether the extreme sentence which would otherwise follow the plea is warranted by the facts. "If any person shall plead guilty to an indictment for murder hereafter committed, the justices of the court having cognizance of the indictment shall determine the degree." For this purpose an inquiry was necessary into the circumstances of the defendant's crime, tending to show the higher or lower degree of enormity which the law recognizes, as it is necessary, when a defendant pleads guilty to an indictment for burglary, under Pub. Stat. chap. 276, § 1. He is to be imprisoned "not exceeding twenty-five years," but the court has no means of knowing whether the penalty should be twenty-five or ten years, or the lowest possible limit of a year and a day, unless some information is given on the subject at a hearing on the degree of enormity. But nobody, it is believed, ever supposed that such a defendant has a constitutional right to a jury trial of this question. It is not an issue in any legal sense, and nobody, it is believed, ever supposed that the accused has a constitutional right to a jury trial to determine whether he shall be fined or imprisoned, or ordered to recognize to keep the peace (chap. 278, § 20), in a case of assault, or be fined and imprisoned in the county jail, or sent to the state prison (chap. 272, § 1), for adultery. And certainly the generation which made and adopted the constitution did not understand that the kinds or amounts of punishment to be imposed by variable judgments are issues triable by jury, for the Act of February 8, 1791, "for the punishment of certain crimes," provided that a person convicted of one crime should be fined or set on the gallows, and might be imprisoned; that for another offense the convict should be set on the gallows one hour, with a rope about his neck, and one end thereof cast over the gallows, and imprisoned, bound to good behavior, and fined, and the court should order the person convicted to suffer all or part of the foregoing punishments, according to the circumstances and aggravations of the offense; for another offense the convict was to be set in the pillory, whipped, imprisoned, bound to good behavior, or fined, or suffer any or all the foregoing punishments, according to the nature and aggravation of the offense; for another the penalty was fine, imprisonment, or whipping, as the court, considering the nature and aggravation of the offense, may order; for another, sitting in the pillory, imprisonment, and fine, or any or all of these punishments, according to the nature and aggravation of the offense. See also Prov. Laws, ed. 1761, pp. 11-14. "We regard it as a well-settled and unquestioned rule of construction that the language used by the legislature in the statutes enacted by them, and that used by the people in the great paramount law, which controls the legislature, as well as the people, is to be always understood and explained in that sense in which it was used at the time the constitution and laws were adopted." Opinion of the Justices, 41 N. H. 551. If a recorded confession of every material averment of an indictment puts the confessor upon the country, the institution of jury trial and the legal nature and effect of a plea of guilty have been very imperfectly understood, not only by the authors of the constitution and their successors down to the present time, but also by all the generations of men who have lived under the common law.

The necessary statutory inquiry into the circumstances of the defendant's crime has been made. His plea has been found to be warranted by the facts, and judgment has followed accordingly. In ascertaining the degree of his crime, he has been fully heard by himself, his witnesses, and counsel. Every facility has been provided him at the public expense to present before an impartial tribunal all the facts or circumstances tending in any way to mitigate or extenuate his guilt. No want of competent intelligence to make the plea is averred, and no mistake or misapprehension as to its effect is alleged. No evidence against him is claimed to have been improperly admitted, and no evidence in his favor is claimed to have been improperly rejected. His sole complaint is that he has had no trial, in the constitutional sense of the word. But his plea precluded such a trial. "The proceeding . . . to determine the degree of the crime of murder after a plea of guilty is not a trial, nor has the defendant any right to have that question determined by a jury." People v. Noll, 20 Cal. 164. The only question remaining was whether there were extenuating circumstances affecting his punishment, and mitigation of punishment on a plea of guilty is not made a question for the jury by the common law or the statute or the constitution. Opinion of the Justices, 9 Allen, 586. "When a prisoner on his arraignment hath pleaded not guilty, and for his trial hath put himself upon the country, which country the jury are, a jury is impaneled." 3 Bl. Com. 880, 352; 4 Bl. Com. 850; 1 Archbold, Crim. Pr. & Pl. 110. And while in some states the common law has been so altered as to confer on the jury who try the general issue of guilt the power of deciding what punishment shall be imposed by a variable judgment, as well as the power of deciding the issue, and while an innovation of this kind was introduced in this state by the provision of the Act of 1837, that "every jury who shall find any person guilty of murder hereafter committed shall also find by their verdict whether it is of the first or second degree," it has not been enacted that there shall be a trial by jury to determine the punishment, when there is no issue, and no denial of any allegation of the indictment, but a general, unqualified confession of guilt by a plea of guilty. People v. Noll, supra. Nor does the constitution confer any such right. "Trial by jury," in article 16 of the Bill of Rights, is common-law language, used in its common-law sense. It means trial by twelve men, who return their unanimous verdict "upon the issue submitted to them." But while the right of every one to have his cause tried, or to be tried himself, if accused of crime, by a jury, is guaranteed and established beyond the power of the legislature to abridge it, the constitution does not compel any one to exercise the right thus secured, and there is no reason whatever to suppose that its makers designed to repeal or alter the moss-grown rule of the common law "by which a party indicted for an offense, however grave its nature, may enter a plea of guilty thereto, if he sees fit so to do," or the other no less well-established rule that "in such a case there is no issue to be submitted to a jury on which a verdict can be founded." "The trial by jury, secured to the subject by the constitution, is a trial according to the course of the common law, and the same, in substance, as that which was in use when the constitution was formed." East Kingston v. Towns, 48 N. H. 64.

The constitutional rights of the defendant have not been hampered or in any way abridged. The right of trial by jury remained to him after the Act of 1837, the same as before. The act is not only in perfect harmony with the constitution in this respect, but, by mitigating the punishment for murder in cases not of the most aggravated nature, and by giving an additional tribunal for the ascertainment of the degree, it manifestly conferred a benefit upon the defendant, instead of depriving him of a right. By pleading guilty, he voluntarily relinquished his constitutional right of trial by jury, as he would by pleading guilty to an indictment for larceny, arson, or any other crime. It was entirely for him to say whether there should be an issue and a trial or not. He knew there would be a trial if he pleaded the general issue, and he also knew that the prosecution would not accept a plea of guilty of murder in the second degree. He preferred to have no issue and no trial, but to have a hearing, under the statute, in regard to the circumstances of the admitted murder, which he claimed would affect the penalty for the single and undivided crime of which he chose to be convicted on his confession. This he might lawfully do. "The legislature have the general power to constitute new tribunals, and to provide new modes of trial for future cases, provided the right to a trial by jury, such as the constitution intends, is secured to every one in the last resort, in every case where it is guaranteed by the constitution." Opinion of the Justices, 41 N. H. 552. "The supreme legislative power within this state shall be vested in the senate and house of representatives, . . . and shall be styled the 'General Court.'" Const. arts. 2, 3. "The general court shall forever have full power and authority to erect and constitute judicatories and courts of record or other courts, to be holden in the name of the state, for the hearing, trying, and determining all manner of crimes, offenses, pleas, processes, complaints, actions, causes, matters and things whatsoever, arising or happening within this state, or between or concerning persons inhabiting or residing or brought within the same, whether the same be criminal or civil, or whether the crimes be capital or not capital, and the said pleas be real, personal, or mixed, and for the awarding and issuing execution thereon." Id. art. 4. And, by article 5, "full power and authority are hereby given and granted to said general court, from time to time to make, ordain, and establish all manner of wholesome and reasonable orders, laws, statutes, . . . so as the same be not repugnant to this constitution, as they may judge for the benefit and welfare of this state and for the governing and ordering thereof and of the subjects of the same." These broad provisions are, for the purposes of this inquiry, restricted only by the declarations of the bill of rights, intended for the better security of persons accused of crimes against arbitrary and hasty public prosecutions, that "no subject shall be arrested, imprisoned, despoiled or deprived of his property, immunities, or privileges, put out of the protection of the law, exiled, or deprived of his life, liberty, or estate, but by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land; . . . and that the legislature shall not "make any law that shall subject any person to a capital punishment . . . without trial by jury." Articles 15, 16.

It is only necessary, therefore, in order to determine whether the legislature transcended its power in the Act of 1837, to inquire whether it is prohibited by the constitution. As we have already seen, the right of the accused to a jury trial was not affected, and we can therefore have no doubt that the proceeding, whether it possesses the essential attributes of a trial in the common sense of the word or not, required by the act to ascertain the degree of the crime where in an indictment for murder the defendant enters a plea of guilty, is constitutional and valid. Statutes of like or similar import have been enacted in many of the states, and have never been held to be unconstitutional; on the other hand, they have been repeatedly and uniformly held to be constitutional. Craig v. State, supra; State v. White, 88 La. Ann. 1218; State v. Atkins, Id. 1253; People v. Noll, supra; People v. Lennox, 67 Cal. 118; State v. Worden, 46 Conn. 349, 33 Am. Rep. 27; Re Staff, 68 Wis. 285, 53 Am. Rep. 285; Dailey v. State, 4 Ohio St. 57; Jones v. Com. 75 Pa. 408. And see State v. Kaufman, 51 Iowa, 578, 33 Am. Rep. 148; State v. Sackett, 39 Minn. 69; Dart v. People, 51 Ill. 286, 2 Am. Rep. 301; League v. State, 36 Md. 257; State v. Moody, 24 Mo. 560; Ward v. People, 30 Mich. 116; Sarah v. State, 28 Ga. 576; Harris v. People, 128 Ill. 585.

Irrespective of the statute, however, the defendant's condition must be held to have been according to "the law of the land." The right of the accused to plead guilty upon his arraignment has been universally recognized from the earliest period in the history of criminal procedure, and from the same period the universally recognized effect of the plea has been to authorize the court having cognizance of the offense to proceed to judgment; and if, contrary alike to the express and unambiguous language of the statute and every known rule of construction, it was held that the defendant had a constitutional right of trial by jury on his plea of guilty, he waived the right by voluntarily submitting to the tribunal having jurisdiction of the offense the determination of the degree of his guilt, and must abide the consequences. "A party may waive a constitutional, as well as a statute, provision made for his benefit." Lee v. Tylotson, 24 Wend. 337, 35 Am. Dec. 624, 626, and note. "In our bill of rights jury trial is a liberty reserved by the people, and excepted out of their grant of governmental powers. . . . It is a private right of the subject, and not a public right of the state" (Wooster v. Plymouth, 62 N. H. 193, 196); and it has always been so understood here (Dartmouth College Trustees v. Woodward, 1 N. H. 129; State v. Albee, 61 N. H. 423, 427, 429, 60 Am. Rep. 325). It is one of the rights not surrendered by the people when they formed themselves into a state, and by its reservation they exempted themselves from the authority of the government they created to abridge it. The purpose was to secure to suitors and persons accused of crime, as individuals, the right and privilege of having their causes heard and determined by a jury, "as a protection of the subject against the government, and of the weak subject against the powerful subject. . . . It is a security, not for the sovereignty, the independence, or the public property of the state, but for private life, private liberty, and private property, against all power, public and private." Wooster v. Plymouth, supra. The prohibition, in article 16 of the Bill of Rights, of "any law that shall subject any person to capital punishment . . . without a trial by jury," must therefore be interpreted as a protection of the accused, and a security for his exclusive benefit, and, as such, he may avail himself of it, or waive it, at his own election. Jones v. Robbins, 8 Gray, 329, 339, 341. And we fail to find in that article, or any other provision of the constitution, any language which precludes or denies to the accused the power or option to waive a jury without authority of statute. But this question is not presented by the case, and consequently will not be discussed. It is enough that the legislature, in the exercise of the power with which it is invested by the constitution, has provided, at the option of the accused, a mode of trial in capital cases without the intervention of the jury, and that the defendant has availed himself of the option.

While the defendant's objection was too late, and gives him no rightful standing here (Sawtelle v. State, 66 N. H. —; Alexander v. United States, 188 U. S. 858, 84 L. ed. 954), his case has nevertheless been considered as if the objection had been seasonably made, and we are constrained to hold, without doubt or difference of opinion, that the judgment against the defendant was and is in all respects legal and valid.

WYOMING SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE of the State of Wyoming, ex rel.
Warren RICHARDSON, Sr.,

v.

Harry B. HENDERSON.

(.....Wyo.....)

1. Appointive as well as elective officers are within Const., art. 6, § 16, providing that officers shall hold until their successors are qualified.
2. The power of the executive and judicial departments in a state government is a grant not a limitation, while the powers of the legislative department are absolute except as restricted and limited by the constitution.
3. The executive does not have any inherent power of appointment of officers.
4. Upon the appointment of an officer to fill a vacancy "until the next meeting of the legislature," under a statute making no further provision as to the incumbency, the meeting of the legislature does not create another vacancy in the office within the meaning of Const., art. 4, § 7, authorizing the governor to fill a vacancy when there is no other provision made therefor, since art. 6, § 16, provides that every officer shall hold "until his successor is qualified."

(January 16, 1894.)

PETITION for a writ of quo warranto to determine by what right respondent was exercising the office of state examiner. Judgment for defendant.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. R. Stoll, for relator:

Laws of 1890-91, chap. 84, § 6, is as follows: "In case of vacancy in the office of state examiner by death, removal, or otherwise, the governor shall fill the same by appointment until the next meeting of the legislature."

Whenever a vacancy exists, for any reason whatever, under the terms of this section, the governor shall fill the vacancy by appointment, until the next meeting of the legislature.

There was no common-law rule upon the subject.

Throop on Public Officers, § 825, stating the common-law rule under the American cases to be that public officers hold over until the choice and qualification of their successors is not supported by the authorities cited.

With the single exception of People v. Oulton, 28 Cal. 44, all of the cases cited by Throop, in so far as they have any application whatever to this question, were decided on the terms of constitutions or statutes providing that officers shall hold over until their successors are elected and qualified.

People v. Oulton, supra, was examined and declared unsound in People v. Bull, 46 N. Y. 65, 7 Am. Rep. 802.

ed. 765, the chancellor says: "There are undoubtedly, some common-law officers who are to be elected or appointed periodically, but who, from the necessity of the case, continue to exercise their functions until others are elected or appointed to fill their places. I am not aware," he continues, "of any general principle of the common-law which authorizes all civil or corporate officers to hold over after the expiration of the time for which they were elected until their places are supplied by others."

In People v. Tieman, 30 Barb. 197, the court says: "I know of no common-law rule by which a public officer appointed or chosen for a specific term, can hold office beyond that term, upon the failure of the proper body to appoint or elect a successor."

See also Christian v. Gibbs, 58 Miss. 814.

If the official term of a public officer is limited by law or constitutional provision to a given term of years without the right expressly or impliedly given, of holding until his successor is chosen and qualified, then in case of the failure to choose a successor, a vacancy must occur, which may result in serious public inconvenience and injury. McCrary, Elections, § 814; People v. Tieman, supra.

McCrary declares that in the United States an officer has an implied right to hold over until his successor is elected and qualified unless the contrary appears to be the plain requirement of the statute, citing —

State v. Wells, 8 Nev. 109; Cordell v. Frizell, 1 Nev. 180; Walker v. Ferrill, 58 Ga. 512.

State v. Wells, supra, explicitly follows, without elaboration or argument, People v. Oulton, 28 Cal. 44.

Cordell v. Frizell, supra, does not sustain the proposition in support of which it is cited by McCrary.

Neither does Walker v. Ferrill, supra, sustain the proposition in support of which it is cited by McCrary.

It is said in State v. Harrison, 118 Ind. 484: "Whether or not, as a general principle of the common law, officers are entitled to hold over beyond their prescribed terms without some express provision, is not settled upon authority."

People v. Oulton, supra, is the only California case which decides that in the absence of constitutional or statutory provisions an officer has an implied right to hold over until his successor is elected and qualified. All other California cases were decided on the terms of constitutional or statutory provisions authorizing the officer in question to hold over until his successor was elected or qualified.

People v. Fitch, 1 Cal. 519; People v. Wells, 2 Cal. 204; People v. Mott, 3 Cal. 502; People v. Reid, 6 Cal. 289; People v. Baine, Id.

NOTE.—The above case re-enforces the line of decisions which denies that the power of appointment of officers is inherent in the executive. It agrees with State v. Boucher (N. Dak.) 21 L. R. A. 539; Fox v. McDonald (Ala.) 21 L. R. A. 529; and State 22 L. R. A.

v. George (Or.) 16 L. R. A. 787, in opposition to State v. Denny (Ind.) 4 L. R. A. 65; State v. Denny (Ind.) 4 L. R. A. 79; and Evansville v. State (Ind.) 4 L. R. A. 93.

The only rule sustained by authorities is that stated in People v. Bull, 46 N. Y. 65, 7 Am. Rep. 302, as follows: "One holding an office, the incumbent of which is, by its tenure, to be annually or periodically appointed or elected, and with no restrictive provision as to the term, may hold over until his successor is elected and qualified."

In Henderson's Case there is "a restrictive provision as to the term" for which he was appointed.

It may be true that Henderson has since the 10th of January, 1893, been a de facto officer, and his acts are valid as against himself and for the protection of third parties and the public. But he has not been a "legal incumbent" of the office. His occupancy of the office has not been such as to preclude a "vacancy" such as the governor is authorized to fill.

State v. Howe, 25 Ohio St. 598, 18 Am. Rep. 321.

The following cases, State v. Murphy, 23 Fla. 188, and State v. Boucher (N. Dak.) 21 L. R. A. 539, have reviewed, in extenso the principles involved in the cases which arise under statutes containing various provisions as to the subject of vacancies in public offices; and are instructive in that there has been an exhaustive examination and discussion of authorities.

State v. Boucher, supra, is an authority which directly sustains the contention of the relator.

Messrs. Lacey & Van Devanter and R. W. Breckons for respondent.

Groesbeck, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This proceeding is instituted in this court to determine the title to the office of state examiner, and the cause is submitted on an agreed statement of facts; the original jurisdiction of this court, under the constitution, in quo warranto as to state officers, being invoked. The relator and respondent have each all the legal qualifications required of an incumbent of the office. Shortly previous to the 20th day of December, 1892, Joel Ware Foster was the duly appointed, constituted, qualified, and acting state examiner, and had resigned the office, and ceased to exercise its duties. On that day, Amos W. Barber, then the acting governor of the state, executed and delivered to Harry B. Henderson a commission to fill the vacancy in said office occasioned by the resignation of said Foster, to hold the office until the next meeting of the legislature of the state and under such appointment and commission said Henderson duly and regularly qualified as such officer, and has discharged the duties of said office ever since, and has received and used the emoluments pertaining thereto. The next session of the legislature occurring after the appointment of the defendant convened January 10, 1893, and adjourned sine die, February 18, 1893, and during the session of the legislature the senate thereof, while in session, on the 10th day of January, 1893, adopted the following resolution: "Whereas, Harry B. Henderson, was duly appointed and commissioned on December 20, 1892, by Amos W. Barber, the then acting governor of the state of Wyoming, as state examiner, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Joel Ware Foster: Now, therefore, be it resolved by the senate that the said appointment of the said Harry B. Henderson to the office of state examiner be and the same is hereby advised, consented to, and confirmed." On February 1, 1893, during the session of the legislature, John E. Osborne, the governor of the state, transmitted to the senate, which was then in session, his nomination of John Stone for the office of state examiner; and on February 12, 1893, the senate adjourned sine die, without having taken any final action on said nomination, without confirming the same, and without either giving or refusing to give its advice and consent to the appointment of said Stone to the office. On March 8, 1893, after the adjournment of the legislature, and during the interval between the regular sessions thereof (the next ensuing regular session being in 1895), Gov. Osborne executed and delivered a commission to said John Stone, attempting to appoint him to the office of state examiner "vice Harry B. Henderson, term expired," to hold the office until the next meeting of the legislature. This commission was not attested by the secretary of state, nor was the great seal of the state affixed thereto. Stone never qualified or attempted to qualify as state examiner, and never entered upon or attempted to discharge the duties of the office, but thereafter, and on March 23, 1893, he resigned said office, or attempted to resign the same. On August 22, 1893, and during the time intervening between the regular sessions of the legislature, Gov. Osborne executed and delivered to the relator, Warren Richardson, Sr., a commission purporting to appoint the relator to the office of state examiner "for the unexpired term of Harry B. Henderson, whose said office of state examiner became vacant on the 10th day of January, A. D. 1893." The words quoted are recited in the commission, which contains the further recital that said Richardson, the relator, was appointed from the date of the commission; that is, "from the 22d day of August A. D. 1893, until the next meeting of the legislature of the state of Wyoming." This commission was not attested by the secretary of state under the great seal of the state. The senate never gave its advice and consent to the appointment of the relator as state examiner, and no nomination of relator for said office was ever made by the governor to the senate, and no nomination or appointment of the relator to said office was ever confirmed by the senate. Upon receipt of the commission, the relator accepted the same, and has ever since been willing and desires to enter upon the duties of the office of state examiner, but has never qualified and has never given any bond as such officer. The defendant, Henderson, has at all times refused, and still refuses, to recognize any right of the relator to the office of state examiner, and claims the right to hold said office, and excludes the relator from the rights, privileges, and emoluments thereof. There has been no session of the legislature of the state since the adjournment on February 18, 1893. The term of office of Amos W. Barber as acting governor expired on the 2d day of January, 1893, and the term of John E. Osborne as governor commenced on said 2d day of January, 1893, at which time he entered upon the discharge of his duties as such governor, and has ever since that date been the legally elected, qualified, and acting governor of the state.

The foregoing statement is a sufficient review of the submitted facts for the determination of the questions involved. Counsel for defendant insist that, as the relator has never qualified, he is not entitled to the office, and has no standing in this court, and is not entitled to any relief, and that, as no reason or excuse is shown for the absence of the attestation of the secretary of state and the great seal of the state from the commission of the governor to relator, the commission is not fully executed, and would not be a sufficient warrant or authority for the assumption of the office by the relator, even if he were otherwise legally entitled to the same. These questions we do not care to pass upon at this time, as it is manifest that, if we should hold that these positions were well taken by the respondent, the greater questions of public interest involved in the case would be postponed. We prefer to decide the main questions involved,—the right of Henderson, the respondent, to hold over beyond the next meeting of the legislature ensuing after his appointment, and the authority of the governor to appoint his successor during the recess of the senate.

Provision is made for the office of state examiner in section 14 of article 4 of the Constitution of this state: "The legislature shall provide for a state examiner, who shall be appointed by the governor and confirmed by the senate. His duty shall be to examine the accounts of state treasurer, supreme court clerks, district court clerks, and all county treasurers, and treasurers of such other public institutions as the law may require and (he) shall perform such other duties as the legislature may prescribe. He shall report at least once a year, and oftener, if required, to such officers as are designated by the legislature. His compensation shall be fixed by law." This mandate to the legislature was promptly obeyed by the enactment of a statute by the first state legislature entitled "An Act Providing for the Office of State Examiner, Defining His Powers and Duties, Prescribing His Bond and Fixing His Compensation," approved January 10, 1891. Sess. Laws 1890-91, chap. 84. The following sections of the Act are quoted as applicable to the case at bar: "Section 1. The office of state examiner is hereby created. Sec. 2. Such examiner shall be appointed by the governor by and with the consent of the senate. He shall hold his office for four years and until his successor in office is appointed and shall have qualified." "Sec. 6. In case of vacancy in the office of state examiner, by death, removal, or otherwise, the governor shall fill the same by appointment until the next meeting of the legislature. The appointee to fill such vacancy shall execute the same bond and take the same oath as herein described, and shall have the same powers and duties as a state examiner appointed by the governor by and with the advice and consent of the senate."

Much space in the brief of counsel for the relator is devoted to the discussion of the rule of the common law as to the right of an incumbent of an office to hold over beyond his term, and until the qualification of his successor. It attacks the position, evidently taken in Throop on Public Officers (at section 325), that the common-law rule, or the rule in the absence of any constitutional or statutory provision, according to the weight of American cases, is that public officers hold over until the choice and qualification of their successors. The authorities cited in support of the proposition are discussed at length, particularly the position taken in People v. Oulton, 28 Cal. 44, which is condemned in the brief of counsel for relator as against the current of authority. At page 562, 19 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, the matter is treated of in the following language: "Although there is authority for the proposition that an officer's functions cease immediately upon the expiration of his term of office, the doctrine supported by the preponderance of opinion is that, in the absence of any express or implied prohibition an officer holds over after the expiration of his term, until a successor is duly chosen and qualified. To this general rule some of the authorities make an exception in the case of judicial officers, and possibly, also, of members of the legislature, and the executive. In most of the states, all doubt is removed by constitutional or statutory provisions that when an officer is elected or appointed for a fixed term the office shall not, on the expiration of the term, become vacant, but the incumbent shall continue to hold until his successor is elected and qualified. In these jurisdictions, consequently, the governor cannot, on the expiration of a term of office, appoint a new officer, but the former incumbent is entitled to hold over until a duly qualified successor presents himself." The Supreme Court of the United States seems to be of a contrary opinion, as it says in the case of Badger v. United States, 93 U. S. 601, 23 L. ed. 992: "By the common law, as well as by the statutes of the United States and the laws of most of the states, when the term of office to which one is elected or appointed expires his power to perform its duties cease." It was held in that case that the constitution and laws of Illinois prescribed a different rule, or, as is said in the opinion, "The system of the state of Illinois seems to be organized upon a different principle;" and the court accordingly held that a certain township officer in Illinois continued in office, and was not relieved from his duties and responsibilities as a member of the board of auditors of the township by his resignation, which had been tendered to and accepted by the proper authority, until his successor was chosen and qualified.

Counsel for relator sums up his position in the case in his brief as follows: "There is nothing in the Wyoming constitution or statutes authorizing Henderson [the respondent] to hold over after the expiration of his term, and until his successor is nominated by the governor and confirmed by the senate. On the authorities, there is no common-law rule authorizing him to do so."

It is unnecessary to ascertain or apply the common-law rule in the case at bar, as our constitution regulates the matter generally in a sweeping provision embodied in article 6, which counsel for relator seems to overlook. Section 16 of the article reads as follows: "Every person holding any civil office under the state, or any municipality therein shall, unless removed according to law, exercise the duties of such office until his successor is qualified, but this shall not apply to members of the legislature, nor to members of any board of (or) assembly, two or more of whom are elected at the same time. The legislature may by law provide for suspending any officer in his functions, pending impeachment or prosecution for misconduct in office." This provision of the fundamental law is applicable to appointive as well as elective officers. It applies to the respondent, Henderson, as he undoubtedly held a "civil office under the state," and was not one of the excepted officers mentioned,—a member of the legislature or a member of any board or assembly,—unless some other provision of equal dignity can be found, that will modify the section quoted, or make it inapplicable to him.

It may be contended that upon the expiration of his term to fill the vacancy resulting from the resignation of Foster, his predecessor in the office,—that is, upon the meeting of the legislature which occurred some twenty days after his appointment,—right to hold the office or fill the vacancy expired by limitation of the statute, and then the governor had the right to appoint for the remainder of the unexpired term of Foster, the original incumbent, under the provision of section 7 of article 4 of the State Constitution: "When any office from any cause becomes vacant, and no mode is provided by the constitution or law for filling such vacancy, the governor shall have power to fill the vacancy by appointment." The statute creating the office of state examiner, supra, makes no express provision as to how the vacancy, if it can be termed a vacancy, shall be filled after the legislature meets, either by the governor or by the governor and the senate acting concurrently by appointment and confirmation. It is also silent as to the term of the successor of the appointee of the governor to fill the vacancy in the recess of the legislature. Is this one of the cases where the governor may appoint to fill a vacancy in the office? Did the temporary and provisional appointment of Henderson, the respondent, continue only until the legislature met? And did his right to the office terminate then, or was he continued in office by virtue of the constitutional provision providing that any person holding a civil office under the state, not being a member of the legislature or a member of a board or assembly, two or more of whom are elected at the same time, shall exercise the duties of such office until his successor has qualified? If the office of state examiner became vacant upon the expiration of the limited period or term of Henderson, the appointee to fill the vacancy temporarily, then he had no right to exercise the duties of the office, and, in the absence of any constitutional or statutory provision for filling the vacancy thus occurring, the governor could appoint under the authority conferred upon him by section 7 of article 4 of the Constitution. The legislature has the right to determine what shall constitute a vacancy, whether the office be filled by an incumbent or not. This is frequently done by statutes providing for special elections where an officer elect dies or refuses to qualify or resigns before the commencement of his official term, and some statutes may be found empowering some officer or board to fill the vacancy thus created by law. Johnson v. Mann, 77 Va. 265. Without some statutory regulation of the matter a vacancy can only exist in an office where there is no lawful incumbent occupying it. An office cannot be said to be vacant while any person is authorized to act in it, and does so act. People v. Van Horne, 18 Wend. 518; Tappan v. Gray, 9 Paige, 507, 4 L. ed. 794.

In the recent case of State v. Murphy, 33 Fla. 138, it was held that where county commissioners are appointed by the governor by and with the advice and consent of the senate, and their term of office fixed at two years, and the governor recommended to the senate certain persons as county commissioners, but the senate adjourned sine die without taking action on these nominations, the governor had the power to fill the offices by appointment, as vacancies existed then, notwithstanding a constitutional provision similar to ours, which was considered only to prevent an hiatus in the office until the appointing power acted. The opinion seems to be based upon certain constitutional and statutory provisions, modifying or neutralizing a general provision of the constitution of Florida that "all state, county and municipal officers shall continue in office after the expiration of their official terms until their successors are duly qualified." This decision is certainly the most favorable one that can be cited on behalf of the relator, but we are not satisfied with the reasoning of the majority opinion. Upon principle and reasoning, the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Mabry seems to be the better view, and the one in consonance with the greater number of authorities. Under our constitution, the governor is not clothed with an absolute power of appointment of state officers. Nearly all of such officers are to be elected by the people, but some of them the constitution expressly requires to be appointed by the governor with the consent of the senate, such as geologist, engineer, trustees of the university, and the state examiner. The legislature may provide for such other state officers not enumerated in the constitution as are deemed necessary (art. 4, § 11), and it seems that in the creation of such officers the governor may be vested by law with the sole power of appointing them, dispensing with the consent of the senate. Such, however, has not been the habit of the state or territorial legislatures in creating new officers, as such officials are generally required by the statutes to be appointed by the governor by and with the advice and consent of the senate, except only in cases of vacancies. The power lodged with the governor to fill vacancies in any office is restricted to cases where the constitution and statutes are silent as to the mode of filling them, and is not a plenary power. The executive is not vested with the sole appointing power, except as to a few offices, and certainly he does not have any inherent power of appointment, as such power, in the states of the Union, is not essentially executive. The sovereign power is in the people, and not in their rulers. The power of the executive and judicial departments is a grant, not a limitation, while the powers of the legislative department are absolute, except as restricted and limited by the Constitution which the people have adopted. State v. Boucher (N. Dak.) 21 L. R. A. 539. This is elementary, and too familiar to need elaboration, that, while the judiciary and the executive have only enumerated powers, the sway of the legislative department is supreme, except as controlled by the limitations imposed by the organic law. The power of the governor to appoint to office must spring from some constitutional grant, or some legislative grant not forbidden by the constitution, and the power bestowed by the constitution upon the executive to fill vacancies in public offices is one only to be exercised where there is no constitutional or statutory provision for filling the vacancy. Although the act before us is silent as to filling the office after the expiration of the time allotted to the appointee to fill a vacancy in the office of state examiner, the constitution is not. He holds a civil office under the state, and continues to exercise its duties until his successor is qualified. This successor must be one appointed by warrant or authority of law, and not in the absence of it. There would be no sense in the position that a vacancy could be created by an attempt to fill a vacancy, nor in the view that one appointee to fill a vacancy could be succeeded by another to fill the same vacancy, where the provisional appointment is made from the same source. The vacancy is already filled by the governor's appointment and there is no reason why the appointee should be displaced by one appointed by a succeeding governor. Such a succession in office is not contemplated by the constitution or by the statute. In the statute under consideration, it is plainly to be seen that the object in limiting the power of appointment to fill a vacancy in the office until the next meeting of the legislature was not intended to confer the power to fill it beyond that time upon the executive, but it was evidently intended that the successor to the provisional appointment should be selected by the original source of appointing power, the governor and the senate acting concurrently and in harmony with each other. Construing the act reasonably, the purpose in limiting the tenure of office of the appointee to fill the vacancy 22 L. R. A.

until the assembling of the legislature was to have the office, not the vacancy, filled by the governor and the senate. There is no provision for filling the office for the unexpired term of the original and regularly appointed incumbent, and in the absence of such a provision the new appointment by the governor, with the assent of the senate, it seems, would hold his office for the full term, and not for the unexpired term. Throop, Pub. Off. §§ 320, 321, and cases there cited.

The appointment of the relator by the governor, as disclosed by his commission, was "for the unexpired term of Harry B. Henderson, whose said office became vacant on the 10th day of January, 1893." This recital in the commission is of no weight in determining the question before us, but it illustrates the difficulties in the way of determining a vacancy in an office filled by an incumbent. If the office became vacant on the 10th day of January, 1893, the first day of the session of the second state legislature, and the first day of the next meeting of the legislature ensuing after the appointment of Henderson by Acting Governor Barber, the vacancy occurred for no other reason than the expiration of Henderson's term, and if his term expired on that day there was no portion of his unexpired term to fill. There is no provision of our constitution and no provision of statute declaring when a vacancy occurs in any office, except in the general election law of the state, chap. 80, Sess. Laws 1890, which declares at section 45, when elective offices become vacant, "on the happening of either of the following events to the incumbent before the end of his term of office, namely: his death, his resignation, his becoming insane or non compos mentis, his ceasing to be an inhabitant of the territory [state], or, if the office is local, his ceasing to be an inhabitant of the district, town, ward or precinct for which he was elected; his conviction of an infamous crime or of any offense involving a violation of official oath, his removal from office, his refusal or neglect to take his oath of office, or to give or renew his official bond, or to deposit or file such oath or bond within the time prescribed by law, and the decision of a competent tribunal declaring his election void." These provisions are confined to vacancies in elective offices, but even if we could enlarge their scope, and include appointive offices, which is doubtful, there is nothing in them which would aid the relator here. It seems that no provision is made for special elections to fill vacancies in elective offices, except where there has been no choice at a general election of any officer, not a precinct officer, or when the rights of a person elected to the office of member of the council (senate) or member of the house of representatives shall cease, by death or otherwise, before the commencement of or during the term for which he shall have been elected. Sess. Laws 1890, chap. 80, § 8. As to vacancies occurring in other elective offices, by statute, the board of county commissioners have power to appoint, as to county and precinct offices, and the governor, as to state offices, either by force of some statute, or under the provisions of section 7 of article 4 of the Constitution. Our statutes are not only barren of any provision determining that a vacancy shall exist in a public office when the term of office ends, but we have an express constitutional provision, applying to all civil offices under the state, and of any municipality therein, except members of the legislature and certain boards or assemblies, continuing the incumbent of an office in the discharge of his duties until the qualification of his successor, and this provision must control any statutory provision. The official may not evade the responsibilities thrust upon him by this constitutional provision, even by resignation. His successor must present himself, duly qualified, before the incumbent can release himself from the inexorable requirements of the constitution that he has sworn to support. Such cases may indeed be rare, but they may occur. The mandate of the constitution precludes an interregnum in the office, and was doubtless intended to prevent inconvenience in the public service, by keeping filled all the public offices for the dispatch of the public business. The successor who is competent to relieve the incumbent must have the right to the office, and be the proper and legal successor of the incumbent. He must be elected or appointed at the proper time by the proper authority, either by the people themselves, or by some one or more of their duly appointed and accredited agents; otherwise, he cannot oust the incumbent. Under the Utah statutes, where an election was not held at the time prescribed by law for county collector, an election at another time was held invalid, and the incumbent was held entitled to hold over until the election or appointment and qualification of his successor; and Paine on Elections (sec. 227) was quoted with approval in the opinion: "That if there was a vacancy, in any just sense, after the expiration of the term, and before the election and qualification of a successor, the statute itself fills the vacancy, by providing that the incumbent shall hold until the election and qualification of a successor, and that a failure to elect a successor to an office at the expiration of its term does not create a vacancy to be filled by appointment. . . . The incumbent holds over for an indefinite period, if no successor is elected and qualified." People v. Hardy, 8 Utah, 68. In People v. Lord, 9 Mich. 227, the incumbent of the office of probate judge died after his re-election, and before his qualification. Under the provisions of the constitution of Michigan, the governor is to appoint a person to fill the vacancy in that office to continue until a successor is elected and qualified, who is to hold his office for the unexpired term. The governor appointed one to fill the vacancy for the old term, and at the expiration of such term appointed another to fill the vacancy for the new term. The court held the first appointment valid, and that it continued until the vacancy was filled by a special election called pursuant to law, and that the second appointment for the vacancy occurring in the new term was invalid, as prohibited by the constitution, the first appointee evidently holding until a successor was elected and qualified. The rule in this case was followed 22 L. R. A.

in a later Michigan case (Lawrence v. Hanley, 84 Mich. 399), where a county auditor elected died before he had qualified and entered upon the duties of his office, and the governor appointed one to fill the vacancy. It was held, as to this office, that the governor had no power to appoint, and that the incumbent held over until his successor was elected at a special election provided by law. In Indiana, one elected a township trustee at the regular election for township officers died before the vote was announced. An attempt was made to elect his successor at a succeeding general election, without authority of law to do so, and also to appoint a successor by the county board. The election and appointment were held void, as there was no authority of law for either, and the incumbent of the office was continued in office; there being no vacancy until the qualification of a successor elected by the same electoral body or constituency which elected the incumbent, at a time authorized by law. Kimberlin v. State, 180 Ind. 120, 14 L. R. A. 858. In State v. Harrison, 113 Ind. 434, a president of the several boards of trustees of the benevolent institutions of the state was elected by the legislature for a term of four years. The act provided that, if a vacancy should occur in the office when the legislature was not in session, the governor should appoint, the appointment to hold good until the next session. The term of the officer first elected expired during the session of a legislature held four years after his election, but that body adjourned without electing a successor to the incumbent. The governor, being of the opinion that the failure of the legislature to elect a successor "produced a vacancy" in the office, appointed another to fill the office. In a contest for the position by the incumbent and the governor's appointee, the court held that the incumbent held over, under the provisions of the Indiana constitution, and that there was no vacancy, as the incumbent held his office by virtue of the constitutional provision continuing him in office until his successor should be elected and qualified. In this case it was held that the constitutional provision applied as well to officers elected by the legislature as to those chosen by the people. It was further said in the opinion that "the word 'vacancy,' as applied to an office has no technical meaning. An office is not vacant so long as it is supplied in the manner provided by the constitution or law with an incumbent who is legally qualified to exercise the powers and perform the duties which pertain to it; and, conversely, it is vacant, in the eye of the law, whenever it is unoccupied by a legally qualified incumbent, who has a lawful right to continue therein until the happening of some future event." The cases cited are: Storking v. State, 7 Ind. 326; Collins v. State, 8 Ind. 344; Akers v. State, Id. 484; State v. Bemenderfer, 96 Ind. 874; Goeman v. State, 106 Ind. 203; Butler v. State, 20 Ind. 169; People v. Tilton, 37 Cal. 614; Com. v. Hanley, 9 Pa. 513; Johnston v. Wilson, 2 N. H. 202, 9 Am. Dec. 50. The court further says: "Of course, it is not to be understood that an office cannot become vacant, as respects the appointing power, so long as it remains in the actual physical occupancy of some one who asserts a claim thereto. An office is legally vacant unless the occupant has an unexpired right or title, founded in the constitution or law, precisely as a house is vacant of a lawful tenant in case the lessee, without any provision authorizing him to hold over, refuses to surrender at the expiration of his term."

The California cases are much in point. Although the earlier decisions held to the contrary, the law of that state is now settled, by repeated decisions, that the incumbent holds over until his successor is appointed and qualified in the mode provided by law, and that the expiration of his term does not in itself create a vacancy. People v. Tyrrell, 87 Cal. 475, approving People v. Tilton, 37 Cal. 614; People v. Bissell, 49 Cal. 407. Some of the cases in that state are based upon a provision of the Political Code which declares that "every officer must continue to discharge the duties of his office, although his term has expired, until his successor has qualified."

In the case of People v. Bissell, supra, the court held that an incumbent of the office held until his successor in the office, inspector of gas meters, was appointed by the governor and confirmed by the senate, and that Parkinson, appointed by the governor alone, without the assent of the senate, was not his successor. Wallace, Ch. J., says in his opinion: "So long as Bissell, therefore, continues to discharge the duties of his office pursuant to the requirements of section 879 of the Code, even though his term of office has expired, there is no vacancy in the office, in the absolute sense, nor in any sense which would authorize the governor to fill it without consent of the senate first had. Such a vacancy would only be caused by the resignation or death of the incumbent, or some other event by which the duties of the office were no longer discharged at all, in which case, and in order to prevent a failure of public service, the governor might appoint during a recess of the senate." Rhodes, J., concurring, said that by virtue of the section of the Code the incumbent would continue to discharge the duties of his office until his successor was qualified, and that "it results from this that there was no vacancy in the office, which the governor was authorized to fill by appointment." In the case of People v. Tilton, 37 Cal. at page 624, the court says, after reviewing at length the California cases: "The law, therefore provides in express terms for filling the office by the old incumbent from the date of the expiration of the term until a successor is elected and qualified in the mode provided by law." And again: "But till a successor is elected the office is temporarily filled by the party designated by the law, and there is no vacancy, within the meaning of the constitution, and no occasion for calling into exercise the extraordinary power of the governor, which was only given by the constitution in order that the public interest might not suffer for want of a party authorized to discharge the duties pertaining to a public office. If a vacancy occurs, then, by the lapse of the term, 22 L. R. A.

the law provides how it shall be filled till a successor is elected and qualified; and that is by the old incumbent, and not by an appointment by the governor." Other cases lay down the same doctrine. They have gone over the same ground, and it is not necessary to review them. Among them are Smoot v. Somerville, 59 Md. 84; State v. Rareside, 32 La. Ann. 934; Brady v. House, 50 Miss. 607; State v. Pagan, 42 Conn. 32; State v. Davis, 45 N. J. L. 390; State v. Bryson, 44 Ohio St. 457; State v. Howe, 25 Ohio St. 588, 18 Am. Rep. 321; Borton v. Buck, 8 Kan. 307; People v. Osborne, 7 Colo. 605; and the recent and well-considered case of State v. Boucher (N. Dak.) 21 L. R. A. 589.

The case of State v. Lusk, 18 Mo. 338, has been much cited, even since it was overruled by the more recent cases of State v. Seay, 64 Mo. 89, 27 Am. Rep. 206, and State v. Thomas, 102 Mo. 85. In State v. Seay the statute regulated the matter of the vacancy by providing for the qualification of an officer elect before the commencement of his term. The officer elect died two days before his term began, but after he had qualified, and it was decided that this created a vacancy which the governor might fill by appointment. The decision was based upon the peculiar provision of the Missouri statute, and upon the fact that upon the expiration of the incumbent's term his successor had been elected and qualified. In State v. Thomas it is said, in the course of the opinion: "The fact that the incumbent remains clothed with official authority, in furtherance of a wise provision of public policy and of public law, cannot enlarge the boundaries of his official term, or arrest the operation of the power of appointment or of election. Of course, these remarks are subject to the conditions that the law has provided for filling the office in one of the modes mentioned, and that, therefore, the election or appointment cannot be classed as voluntary."

A careful reading of the numerous decisions of the American courts on the question is convincing that the doctrine is too well entrenched to be dislodged at this time, that where a constitutional or statutory provision exists, permitting or commanding an incumbent of an office to continue in the discharge of his duties until his successor is qualified, it must be construed as controlling and the expiration of the official term cannot be deemed a vacancy, unless there is some legal successor appointed or elected by some competent authority to take the place of the incumbent. His holding over may be a mere prolongation of the term (Carr v. Wilson, 32 W. Va. 419, 8 L. R. A. 64), or be considered a contingent extension (People v. Whitman, 10 Cal. 88), or as adding an additional, contingent, and defeasible term to the original fixed term (State v. Harrison, 113 Ind. 441). It excludes the possibility of a vacancy, and consequently the power of appointment, except in case of death, resignation, ineligibility, or the like. Gosman v. State, 106 Ind. 203, and cases cited.

Frequent reference is had to the case of Johnston v. Wilson, 2 N. H. 202, 9 Am. Dec. 50, by courts entertaining opposite views.

The usual quotation from the opinion is the following language: "It must be obvious, also, that, when once accepted, no vacancy can be said to exist in the office till the term of service expire, or till the death, removal, or resignation of the person appointed." No one can seriously question the correctness of this statement, but it seems it has been warped, in many instances, from its true meaning. Of course, no vacancy can occur in an office filled by an incumbent "till the term of service expire," but the question that has been a prolific source of inquiry is whether or not a vacancy exists after the term of service expires. It may not be amiss to see what the decision was in this leading case: Johnston was appointed collector at the annual March meeting of the town of Hillsborough and signified his acceptance of the office, but did not take the oath of office. Nothing further was done upon the subject until the ensuing month of May, when the tax list of the town was presented to Johnston for collection. He declined receiving it unless the selectmen would furnish him an indemnity bond for the nonresident taxes, it then being so late as to endanger the legal recovery of them. This indemnity was refused, and the selectmen, under the impression that the conduct of Johnston amounted either to a resignation or nonacceptance of the office, proceeded to appoint another collector, who was Wilson, one of their own number. The oath was administered to him, and he commenced the collection of taxes. As some doubts arose concerning the legality of Wilson's appointment, the town, at a meeting in November of the same year, called for other purposes passed a vote to ratify the doings of the selectmen in respect to Wilson's appointment. No new warrant was given to him, and no new oath was administered. He seized and sold thereafter certain property of Johnston as a distress for the payment of his taxes for the year. The court held that under the statute the selectmen could only fill a vacancy where the town had neglected or refused to choose a collector, and such collector could only collect the county and state taxes, not the town taxes. The town had not neglected to fill the office. It was also held that the appointment of the selectmen, as it was void, could not be ratified by the town at the November meeting, because the meeting was called for a different purpose, and the town was not legally "warned," in the quaint language of the law, and, further, that Wilson had never taken the oath after this November meeting. At the close of the opinion, however, it seems to be clearly intimated that the old incumbent of the office of collector would hold over as Johnston had not been sworn, and as Wilson had not been legally appointed and sworn. The court says: "It is therefore manifest that those town officers, once chosen and sworn, are the only ones qualified to perform official duties until new ones are sworn, as well as 'chosen in their room.' The town is thus never destitute of officers duly qualified; and it cannot be reasonable or necessary that, while the offices are already filled by persons duly qualified, others, not duly qualified, should be enabled to perform the duties of them."

In the case of Re Johnson County Comrs. (Wyo.) 82 Pac. Rep. 854, this court held that "an old office is vacated by death, resignation, or removal. An office newly created becomes ipso facto vacant in its creation." In that case the statute creating the office of judge of the fourth judicial district provided for a temporary appointment by the governor to fill the office. The syllabus to the case, which was not prepared by the court, is misleading. The statute conferred, in express terms, the authority upon the governor to fill the office provisionally by appointment; and as the legislature is untrammelled as to that office, in this respect, by any constitutional provision, the power conferred upon the governor was by the act itself, which was held constitutional, and not by the terms of the constitutional provision requiring the governor to fill a vacancy in a public office where no mode is provided by the constitution or the law for filling the same. The vacancy in an office, which may be filled by the governor, under the constitution, arises in cases of emergency, where there is no person in an office, of lawful capacity to act therein,—such an occasion as resignation, disqualification, death, or the like, and where there is no provision either in the constitution or in any statute for filling the same. It would seem to apply where there was no officer in the position, or, it may be, where he is disqualified to act, and does not act, and there is no method pointed out by law to fill the place. It has no reference to the case of an incumbent in an office, whose term, however limited, has expired, and who is awaiting his successor, for his right to the office has not terminated and cannot terminate under the constitution until his successor appears, endowed with the necessary qualifications that shall entitle him to it, chief among which must be his appointment by competent authority at the proper time. Until that event happens, the office is filled by an incumbent who exercises the duties of the office under constitutional authority, and there is no vacancy.

It appears that the senate did not act upon the nomination of Stone by Gov. Osborne, possibly because it desired to have Henderson continue in the office. This is shown by the action of the senate confirming him. This was ineffectual, as the appointment of Acting Governor Barber was not made to the senate, but until the legislature met. At that time, a new appointment was necessary and proper, as is conceded, but such appointment could then have been made only by Gov. Osborne, by and with the advice of the senate. Our conclusions are that the respondent is lawfully and constitutionally authorized to discharge the duties of the office of the state examiner, and that there has been no vacancy in the office, which the governor could fill by his appointment without the consent of the senate.

The finding and judgment will be for the defendant.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Wisconsin, ex rel. WISCONSIN TELEPHONE CO., Appt.,JANESVILLE STREET R. CO., Respnt.

(.....Wis.....)

1. An electric railroad company using strong currents of electricity on wires which are not insulated, which directly cross telephone wires which are insulated, may be compelled to place guard wires where they will prevent the contact of the telephone and railway wires in case of the breaking of poles or the falling of wires on account of storms or otherwise,—especially where there is an ordinance requiring such guard wires, which the telephone company has complied with.

2. An ordinance requiring guard wires for electric wires “whenever it shall be necessary to cross” other electric wires applies to wires already erected, since it provides a remedy for an existing evil.

3. Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel an electric railway company to place guard wires where they will prevent dangerous contact of its uninsulated wires with the insulated wires of a telephone company as required by ordinance.

(January 30, 1894.)

APPEAL by relator from an order of the Circuit Court for Rock County denying a writ of mandamus to compel defendant to place guards over its electric wires. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.
* Messrs. Fethers, Jeffries & Fifield, with Messrs. Miller, Noyes & Miller, for appellant:

The ordinance passed October 10, 1892, to regulate the stringing of wires, is valid, and is a reasonable exercise of the police power of the city of Janesville.

The presumption is always in favor of the reasonableness of the ordinance, and unless it is unreasonable on its face, or is proved to be so by proper evidence, the ordinance will be upheld.

1 Beach, Pub. Corp. 512; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 819 et seq.; Com. v. Patch, 97 Mass. 221.

It seeks only to compel the defendant to so use and maintain its property as not to interfere with the proper enjoyment by others of the rights which they and the public generally have in the streets of Janesville and in the property which they may possess. This is clearly an exercise of the police power.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 572.

The reasonableness of regulations, such as those contained in the ordinances in question, has been established by numberless precedents.

It was not intended by the ordinance to require the railway company to construct and maintain a guard wire four feet above the trolley wire.

At the time of the adoption of the ordinance there were electric light wires, telegraph wires, telephone wires, and wires transmitting electric energy from generators to motors in various factories and shops in the city of Janesville, and the street railway wires. All of the wires are mentioned in the section except the street railway wires. The section refers by name to all of these wires except the street railway wires, which were then in use and had been for more than three months. The omission of the street railway wires is significant.

Orton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from an order of the circuit court sustaining the demurrer of the respondent to the relation of the appellant, and quashing the alternative writ of mandamus. The material facts set out in the relation are briefly as follows: The relator, the telephone company, obtained its right from the state to do business in the city of Janesville, and to erect and maintain poles, cross arms, and wires over and through the streets, ways, and alleys of said city, and operated telephone wires and erected poles in the streets, ways, and alleys, with the permission, consent, and approval of said city, from 1879 until the present time, at a great expense, and has now 151 telephones in said city and suburbs. The main trunk lines of the poles and wires have been and are now maintained upon East, Main, and Milwaukee streets. All the rights, right of way, and easements that it had previously enjoyed as a telephone company were confirmed by an ordinance of said city, dated October 10, 1892, a copy of which is attached hereto, and marked "Exhibit 1," and the company has since exercised and enjoyed the same, and all the said lines and poles have been where they are now for years, with a few exceptions, and where they should be. The relator has complied with the statutes of the state, and paid its license fee, and has a license to do business as a telephone company. The defendant is a corporation by the laws of the state, and obtained its rights to operate a street railway in said city by horse power by ordinances of said city, dated October 8 and November 25, 1885, and operated the same on the same streets upon which the relator had its poles and wires, among others East, Main, and Milwaukee streets. By an ordinance of the city, dated December 15, 1891, the former ordinances were so amended as to give the defendant the right to use "electrical power" in operating its street railway, and on a single or double track, with all necessary curves, turnouts, switches, poles, brackets, and wires. The defendant has erected its poles, wires, and overhead wires over and above the streets already occupied by the relator in the manner aforesaid, and, among others, East, Main, and Milwaukee streets, in said city. The defendant company is compelled to use very strong conductors of electricity to run its cars, and it uses main and trolley wires, which are not insulated, while the wires of the relator are insulated, and though good and sufficient, can only use feeble and delicate currents of electricity in telephoning. The currents used by the defendant are exceedingly dangerous to property and persons, by setting fires to buildings, and by injuring persons coming in contact therewith. The poles of the relator are liable to break, and the wires to break, and fall, by the force of storms, and cannot be prevented; and, when the wires do fall, they make direct crosses with the wires of the defendant, and the high-tension currents of electricity used by the defendant pass in the wires of the relator, and destroy its instruments and other property, and endanger the health of its employes and others, and are liable to set fires in the city. If the defendant had constructed its railway system properly, it would have placed "guard wires" at not less than four feet above its trolley wires, and in that manner prevented such serious consequences by restraining and carrying off the high-tension currents safely. Such guard wires, so placed and maintained, are the approved method of avoiding or preventing the threatened mischief. The defendant is required to apply such safeguards by an ordinance of the city, dated October 10, 1892. The relator has complied with said ordinance, and the defendant has failed to do so. This is the substance of the relation.

We are of the opinion that the facts set out in the relation are sufficient to entitle the relator company to the remedy asked for: (1) The telephone company occupied the streets of the city with its poles and wires, and was in the safe and successful prosecution of its business, under the authority of law, and "by the permission, consent, and approval" of the city of Janesville. (2) The defendant company afterwards sets its poles and extends its wires along the same streets, so that its lines frequently cross the lines of the relator, and in such near contact as to endanger the persons in its employment, and its property, and threaten the destruction of its business. Has the defendant the right to do this, if it is in its power to prevent the threatened mischief? By the common maxim that one person has no right to use his own to the injury of another, and by the common principles of elementary law, it would seem that it had not. The defendant has intruded upon the established business of the relator in such way as to endanger it and the persons engaged in it, when, by the adoption of such a simple safeguard, and the only practicable one, such danger can be avoided, and the business of both subsist together. Ought not the defendant to be compelled to adopt such safeguard? These facts are admitted by the demurrer. The learned counsel of the respondent insists that the relator had not such priority of its business, by any right. It is averred in the relation that it was established according to law, and prosecuted "by the permission, consent, and approval" of the city. That would clearly give the relator a right, and that right and its enjoyment were prior to any right of the defendant. The relator's wires are up in the streets, bearing sufficient electrical power to make telephonic communications, and the defendant crosses them in many places with its wires, bearing electrical power sufficient to propel the cars upon its street railway, and the first storm that comes may blow down the poles and wires of the relator, and its wires come in contact with the wires of the defendant, where they cross each other, and become charged with its dangerous currents of electricity, set fire to the buildings in which the telephone instruments are used, and injure other property, and the persons employed in the "Exchange" and other places, so as to endanger or destroy the business of the relator. Ought not the defendant to be compelled to adopt the above safeguards to prevent this threatened mischief, or to withdraw its lines from the vicinity of the relator's wires? The company that caused the mischief ought to repair it.

Section 7 of the Ordinance of the city dated October 10, 1892, imposes this duty upon the company using this "electrical power system" in all cases, and requires it to apply such safeguards under a penalty. But much more is it the duty of such company when it is an intruder upon the already established business of another company. The electric force is the most powerful and dangerous agency of nature, and, even when restrained or controlled by the most perfect machinery and appliances, its high-tension currents are extremely dangerous in many directions. If a municipal corporation has not the inherent provisional or police power to pass ordinances to regulate or restrain the use of such a dangerous agency within the corporate limits, it certainly cannot have such power for any purpose. It is claimed that said ordinance has only future operation or effect. In application to the case, section 7 of said Ordinance provided: "Whenever it shall be necessary to cross . . . telephone line or lines or any wires used," etc. Has it not been necessary for the defendant company to cross these telephone lines or wires of the relator since the passage of the ordinance, and is it not now necessary to do so? Then the ordinance, by its terms, is applicable to this case. The ordinance is made to regulate existing things, and things which continue to exist, as the wires of the defendant cross the wires of the relator. Whenever, at any time, wires so cross, this safeguard must be applied. The ordinance has a present and future effect. It is said these wires crossed before the ordinance was passed. That is true, and they have continued to cross ever since, in violation of the ordinance. The ordinance does not prohibit the crossing of such wires. It provides the remedy for it as an existing evil, and requires safeguards to be so placed as to avoid the danger to persons and property. It is not retroactive in any sense. First. The ordinance is reasonable, because it requires that to be done which in law and good conscience the defendant ought to do for the protection of the relator, whose established business it has endangered and disturbed. Second. It is clearly sustained under the police power of the city. "The test is whether it is designed and tends to protect some public or private right from the injurious act of the company; as when it prohibits the running of the cars of one company on any street so near the depot of another railroad as to interfere with safe and convenient access to the latter road." Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, 597-599. The statute of New York, requiring telegraph, telephone, and electric wires to be placed underground in streets in certain cities (Laws 1885, chap. 499), was upheld in People v. Squire, 107 N. Y. 598; Western U. Tele. Co. v. New York, 88 Fed. Rep. 552, 8 L. R. A. 449. The right and authority in a city "to regulate, control, and prohibit the location, laying, use, and management of telegraph, telephone, and electric light and power 'wires and poles' . . . in order to guard and secure the public safety and convenience," is upheld in Wisconsin Teleph. Co. v. Oshkosh, 62 Wis. 32. Ordinance to regulate street railways is upheld in State v. Madison Street R. Co. 72 Wis. 612, 1 L. R. A. 771; and in State v. Hilbert, 72 Wis. 184.

Cities can regulate the placing of electric wires in the streets. Keasbey, Electric Wires, 88; Van Hook v. Selma, 70 Ala. 361, 45 Am. Rep. 85; Mutual U. Tele. Co. v. Chicago, 16 Fed. Rep. 309; State v. East Orange, 41 N. J. L. 127; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Philadelphia (Pa.) 12 Atl. Rep. 144; American U. Tele. Co. v. Harrison, 81 N. J. Eq. 627; Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Jacksonville, 67 Ill. 87, 16 Am. Rep. 611; Sioux City Street R. Co. v. Sioux City, 138 U. S. 98, 34 L. ed. 898.

There can be no question, at this late day, but that our municipal corporations may make all reasonable regulations for the location and use of electric wires in the street, and require all reasonable safeguards for the same. The question is virtually so settled in this state by our own decisions. The relator is entitled to sue out the writ of mandamus to compel the defendant to properly place such guard wires as the proper safeguard in such a case to protect its rights and safety. The relator is especially interested in the defendant's performance of this public duty. It is admitted to be true that such guard wires so placed are the very best and most approved method of safeguard in such case. This, then, is a clear legal right to be enforced by mandamus. Marbury v. Madison, 5 U. S. 1 Cranch, 137, 2 L. ed. 60; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Hall, 91 U. S. 343, 23 L. ed. 428; People v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 180 Ill. 175.

There is no adequate remedy in such a case, except by the writ of mandamus, to compel the respondent company to do what it is clearly right for it to do, and that the relator has the right to compel it to do. The penalty enforced would not cure the mischief. Rea v. Barker, 3 Burr. 1266; Scott & Jarnagin, Telegraphs, § 78; High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 320; People v. Boston & A. R. Co. 70 N. Y. 569; Haines v. People, 19 Ill. App. 354; People v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 67 Ill. 118; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. People, 121 Ill. 483; Indianapolis & C. R. Co. v. State, 87 Ind. 489; State v. Demaree, 80 Ind. 519; Uniontown v. Com. 84 Pa. 293; Hovee v. Crawford County Comrs. 47 Pa. 361; Reg. v. Luton Roads Trustees, 1 Q. B. 860; Cambridge v. Charlestown Branch R. Co. 7 Met. 70; Railroad Comrs. v. Portland & O. O. R. Co. 63 Me. 269, 18 Am. Rep. 208; State v. North-eastern R. Co. 9 Rich. L. 247, 67 Am. Dec. 551; State v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co. 29 Conn. 538; State v. Wilson, 17 Wis. 687; State v. Richter, 37 Wis. 275; State v. Wood County Suprs. 41 Wis. 28; State v. Chicago, M. & N. R. Co. 79 Wis. 259, 12 L. R. A. 180; Porter Trp. Overseers v. Jersey Shore Overseers, 82 Pa. 275.

It is said that no such damages have yet accrued. The relation very clearly shows that such damage is imminent and threatening, and the danger is all the time present. This might be sufficient ground for an injunction to restrain the defendant from crossing the wires of the relator with its wires,—a much more violent remedy. The relator does not seek to prohibit such crosses, but only to make them safe. The relator is conducting its telephone business under constant fear and apprehension. Must it wait until the full extent of the apprehended consequences have been realized? The remedy sought is clearly the proper one. The demurrer of the respondent to the relation, and the motion to quash the writ, should have been overruled.

The order of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded with direction to overrule the demurrer and the motion to quash the writ, and for further proceedings according to law.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

J. D. COLBURN

v.

Town of GROTON.

(.....N. H.....)

1. Whether or not the payment by defendant of the claim of a third person was an admission of liability so as to be provable in the case, or was a mere purchase of peace which cannot be proved, is a preliminary question of fact for the presiding justice.

NOTE.—The above not only decides an interesting question of evidence but contains in the opinion a valuable discussion of the authorities on the subject.

2. The exclusion of evidence of payment of a third person's claim as an admission of liability is not ground for reversal where it does not appear that it was against the evidence to hold that it was a mere purchase of peace.

3. Evidence that travelers were accustomed to warn each other to avoid meeting others at a spot in a highway where an accident occurred is not admissible in an action against the town to recover for injuries caused by the accident.

(March 15, 1890.)

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Grafton County Court made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's neglect to keep a highway in repair, which resulted in a verdict in favor of defendant. Judgment on the verdict.

At the time of the accident Mrs. Estes was riding in the vehicle with plaintiff and received injuries, and plaintiff offered to show that the town had settled her claim for damages. This evidence was excluded. Plaintiff offered to show that there was a custom among travelers to give warning to others to avoid meeting at the place where the accident occurred. This evidence was excluded.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. S. B. Page for plaintiff.

Messrs. Fling & Chase, for defendant:

Selectmen have no authority, ex officio, to make any settlement with the traveler. If this be sound, how could the fact of their doing so be any admission against the town of its liability? The doctrine of Coffin v. Plymouth, 49 N. H. 178, makes it hazardous for towns to attempt to negotiate or make any settlement or buy their peace.

The law encourages settlements. Why should it not make it safe to settle cases of the kind under discussion and without prejudice.

Grimes v. Keene, 52 N. H. 330.

Doe, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In a criminal case, when the defendant's confession is offered as evidence, it is necessary to inquire whether it was made under the influence of hope or fear, and for the purpose of gaining some benefit or avoiding some harm connected with the criminal charge. If not made for that purpose, it is held to be voluntary, and is evidence. The purpose of the confession is a question of fact. This distinctly appears in State v. Wentworth, 37 N. H. 196, 218-220, and other cases in which the reported decisions contain a full examination of the evidence bearing on the question. In State v. Howard, 17 N. H. 171, 181-185, the court says: "We are by no means satisfied that judges, in their anxiety to preserve all the rights of the accused, have not gone further in excluding confessions than the principle required them to do. . . . The principle of admission and exclusion is well settled, and founded upon a most satisfactory basis. Confessions obtained by the hope of favor, or by fear of punishment are inadmissible. It is the hope of escape from temporal punishment which excludes, and the hope must be derived from the inducements. . . . The evidence is rejected because the inducements may have led to a false statement, and the confession is therefore not entitled to credit, and not because the public faith is pledged by means of the promise. . . . It is in the application of this principle that the difficulty lies; that is to say, in determining whether hopes have been held out, or fears excited, in the particular case. In the present instance the defendant was told that he had better tell the truth. It has been supposed that a party accused might, from such a declaration, understand that it would be better for him to confess himself guilty. . . . But why should any one so understand, if he was in fact innocent? . . . We do not intend to pass upon this question at this time. Our object is to show how slight, to say the most, is the probability that a declaration of this kind excites any hopes that should cast a suspicion upon the truth of the confession which follows it. . . . The hope here—assuming that hope was excited by the declaration of the magistrate that he had better tell the truth—must have been of the slightest possible character, and the circumstances which intervened between that time and the period when he made the confession which was admitted can leave no shadow of doubt whether the last confession was made through some lingering belief, arising from the declaration of the magistrate, that if he still continued to confess he might find favor.

The evidence is very strong upon this point. . . . We have no hesitation in sustaining the ruling. If anything could have extinguished the faint glimmer of hope which might possibly have existed in the first instance, these circumstances must have been effectual for that purpose. In considering the probable reason for this last confession, we must not lay out of the case the other circumstances which intervened between that and the first. "The probable reason for" a confession cannot be a question of law. "In the earlier cases there has been much conflict upon this subject, resulting in some degree from failing to recognize the question to be largely one of fact alone, to be determined upon a consideration of all the circumstances of the case, instead of which, some of the cases seem to have given to particular expressions a technical character, and to have excluded the confessions where, upon a consideration of all the circumstances, it would not have been found, as matter of fact, that the confessions were made under the influence of hope or fear held out by another. . . . Whether the confession . . . was voluntary or not is purely a question of fact,—as much so as the question whether a witness offered to testify was interested or not, or whether a witness was qualified to testify as an expert, or whether the loss of a paper has been shown, so as to allow the introduction of secondary evidence of its contents. In this and the like cases, the judge who tries the cause must decide, although in some instances he may submit the question of fact to the jury. In either case, whether the decision be by the judge alone, or it be also passed upon by the jury, no exception lies, so far as the question is one of fact. If, however, upon the evidence reported by the judge, it clearly appears that there was error in his finding upon the matter of fact, it may be corrected, as in other cases where a verdict is against evidence." State v. Squires, 48 N. H. 364, 369, 370.

When it is said that the admissibility of a confession is a "matter resting wholly in the discretion of the judge, upon all the circumstances of the case" (1 Greenl. Ev. § 219), the meaning is not that he has arbitrary power but that the question is one of fact. "Judicial discretion," in its technical legal sense, is the name of the decision of certain questions of fact by the court." Darling v.

Westmoreland, 52 N. H. 401, 408, 18 Am. Rep. 55. "Whether the confession made to Leavitt was made in consequence of inducement held out by Leavitt was a question of fact to be decided by the judges who presided at the trial; and their finding upon this question is a finality, as much as the verdict of a jury upon a question of fact." State v. Pike, 40 N. H. 899, 407, 6 Am. Rep. 533. "The law is too well settled in this state to be considered an open question. We do not interfere with the verdict of a jury, to set it aside as against evidence, unless we are well satisfied that it has been procured through corruption, or manifest mistake in the consideration and application of the evidence, and that substantial justice has not been done." Lisbon v. Bath, 21 N. H. 819, 835; Wendell v. Safford, 12 N. H. 171, 178; Gould v. White, 26 N. H. 178, 188; Clark v. First Cong. Soc. in Keene, 45 N. H. 331, 334; Houston v. Clark, 50 N. H. 479, 483; Jewell v. Grand Trunk Railway, 55 N. H. 84, 95; Fuller v. Bailey, 58 N. H. 71; Smith v. Richards, 29 Conn. 232, 244; Hamaker v. Eberley, 2 Binn. 506, 510, 4 Am. Dec. 477; Wilkinson v. Greely, 1 Curt. C. C. 63; M' Lanan v. Universal Ins. Co. 28 U. S. 1 Pet. 170, 183, 7 L. ed. 98, 104; New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. v. Praloff, 100 U. S. 24, 31, 25 L. ed. 531, 534; Shoemaker v. United States, 147 U. S. 282, 305, 306, 37 L. ed. 170, 187.

When a case is tried by the court, a motion to set aside the finding on the ground that it is against the evidence "stands upon the same footing as if there had been a verdict of the jury." Burnham v. McQuesten, 49 N. H. 446, 454. Whether the fact found by the court at the trial term is that the defendant is guilty, as in Burnham v. McQuesten, or that the defendant's confession was voluntary, as in State v. Squires, a motion for a new trial on the ground that the finding was against the evidence raises a question of fact to be decided by a court upon due consideration of the proof.

"The term 'admission' is usually applied to civil transactions, and to those matters of fact in criminal cases which do not involve criminal intent; the term 'confession' being generally restricted to acknowledgments of guilt. . . . The rules of evidence are in both cases the same. . . . A distinction is taken between the admission of particular facts and an offer of a sum of money to buy peace, for, as Lord Mansfield observed, it must be permitted to men to buy their peace without prejudice to them if the offer should not succeed; and such offers are made to stop litigation, without regard to the question whether anything is due or not. If, therefore, the defendant being sued for £100, should offer the plaintiff £20, this is not admissible in evidence, for it is irrelevant to the issue. It neither admits nor ascertains any debt, and is no more than saying he would give £20 to be rid of the action. But, in order to exclude distinct admissions of facts, it must appear either that they were expressly made without prejudice, or at least that they were made under the faith of a pending treaty, and into which the party might have been led by a confidence of a compromise taking place. . . . It is the condition, tacit or express, that no advantage shall be taken of the admission, it being made with a view to, and in furtherance of, an amicable adjustment, that operates to exclude it. But if it is an independent admission of a fact, merely because it is a fact, it will be received." 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 170, 192.

"An offer by a party to pay a sum of money by way of compromise of an existing controversy is not to be used as evidence against him. But an admission of particular facts, made during a treaty for a compromise, may be given in evidence as a confession. . . . The reason why a mere offer of money or other thing by way of compromise is not to be evidence against him who makes it, is very plain, and easily understood. Such an offer neither admits nor ascertains any debt, and is no more than saying that so much will be given to be rid of the controversy." Sanborn v. Neilson, 4 N. H. 501, 508, 509. "A distinct admission of a fact during an attempt at compromise may be given in evidence, though an offer made for the purpose of effecting a settlement cannot be, and the reason for the distinction is very satisfactory." Hamblett v. Hamblett, 6 N. H. 333, 348. "The reason is that such admissions are in no way necessary to a treaty for a compromise, which is a mere attempt to buy a peace, and are supposed to be made like other admissions, and for some one of the various causes which induce them. But the law protects a party seeking to purchase his peace by denying to his adversary the benefit of any inferences, that might be derived from an attempt to do so, that the cause of action which he seeks to compromise has some foundation in truth." Rideout v. Newton, 17 N. H. 71, 73. That case was assumed on a note for $50 purporting to be signed by the defendant and one L. The question was whether the note was signed by the defendant. Subject to exception, the plaintiff was allowed to prove the following facts: The defendant and L. had been connected in business to some extent. When the writ was served on the defendant, L. not being present, the plaintiff demanded payment of other claims which he had against L., amounting to some one or two hundred dollars. The defendant "asked a person present to advise him as to the propriety of compounding with the plaintiff for the whole, and was advised, if this note was a genuine one, to offer the plaintiff a sum to settle the whole, but, if the note was a forgery, not to pay a cent." The defendant offered $25, and, on being told that was not enough, he offered $50, and then $75. The plaintiff's contention was, not that the mere offer of a sum in settlement was evidence of an admission that the defendant signed the note, but that, in view of the advice he asked and received, it was highly probable he made the offer because the note was genuine. "The defendant," says the court, "upon being advised to make an offer provided his signature to the note was genuine, but not otherwise, proceeds to make the offer. It is said that this offer may be shown, because it is highly probable, from the advice he received, that he would not have made it unless the signature was so. But . . . such a reason would extend to the admission of any other offer of compromise, because such offers are more apt to be made in cases in which the party making them is conscious that the cause of his adversary is well founded than in the opposite cases. The fact that he acted upon advice which he had sought may add a very little to the force of such an inference as is contended for, but too little, altogether, to make the case an exception to the highly salutary, well-defined, and established rule." For this reason the verdict was set aside.

When a defendant offers to pay a certain sum in settlement, his statement that he is too poor to pay more is not sufficient evidence of an intention to admit his liability. Downer v. Button, 26 N. H. 338, 344. Perkins v. Concord Railroad, 44 N. H. 228, was an action for injuries received by a passenger in a collision on the defendants' road. The testimony of another passenger, who was injured in the same collision, that the defendants admitted their liability for injuries caused by the collision, was held competent on the ground (page 225) that "the liability to pay damages in consequence of the accident appears to have been the matter distinctly admitted to the witness, as stated by him in evidence." The decision is an application of the rule that a distinct admission of a fact is not rendered inadmissible by being made during a settlement. The preliminary question always is, not merely whether an admission of a fact was made during a settlement or negotiation, but whether a statement or act was intended to be an admission. It is a question, not of time or circumstances, but of intention. On that question the time and circumstances may be material evidence. "The rule is strictly held in this state that an offer to compromise is not to be shown, on account of the tendency such a practice would have to discourage the settlement of disputes. But it is at the same time held, with equal clearness, that any independent admission, though made in the course of negotiations for a compromise, may be shown." Plummer v. Currier, 52 N. H. 287, 296; Harrington v. Lincoln, 4 Gray, 568, 567; Durgin v. Somers, 117 Mass. 55, 61; Draper v. Hatfield, 124 Mass. 58, 56; Egans v. Smith, 5 T. B. Mon. 363, 17 Am. Dec. 74. In Sanborn v. Neilson, 4 N. H. 501, before cited, the defendant's rejected offer, made during a negotiation for an adjustment of the plaintiff's claim, was held to be evidence, because it followed and was based upon the defendant's express admission of the alleged tort. Upon the testimony, the fact could be found that the offer was intended to include a repetition of the admission in an indirect form. This view is presented in the case put (page 509) as an illustration: "If A. sue B. for $100, and B. offer to pay $20, this offer shall not be received as evidence, because it may have been made merely for the sake of peace, where nothing was due. But in such a case, if B. admit expressly that $20 are due, and offer to pay that sum, . . . both the admission and the offer are evidence." See Snow v. 22 L. R. A.

Batchelder, 8 Cush. 518, 516, 517. His offer is evidence when made for one purpose, and is not evidence when made for a different purpose. In both cases, his decisive intent is a fact to be found by weighing competent proof. "Before the statute making parties competent witnesses, the ordinary way to prove their intent or understanding was by circumstantial evidence. But, now that the party himself is admitted to testify, there is no reason for confining his testimony to a variety of circumstances tending to show his purpose or understanding, when he knows, and can testify directly, what that purpose or understanding was." Delano v. Goodwin, 48 N. H. 203, 205, 97 Am. Dec. 601; Norris v. Morrill, 40 N. H. 395, 401, 402; Graves v. Graves, 45 N. H. 328; Hale v. Taylor, Id. 405.

The questions of law and fact are the same, whether an admission is claimed to have been made by a payment or by a rejected offer. If a plaintiff and his horse and wagon were injured in a collision with a cart driven by the defendant, and the expense of repairing the wagon was paid by the defendant, whose subsequent offer to pay a certain sum for the injury of the horse was rejected, the question might arise whether the accepted payment and the rejected offer were evidence in an action for the plaintiff's personal injury. Payment, or an offer of payment, may be made to a plaintiff, or to another person having a claim so far like the plaintiff's that the defendant's admission of liability would be applicable to both. The payment or offer is evidence of his liability, when it is an admission of liability. When a pauper has been supported by a town, or the town has paid for his support, and the act was an admission of liability and not a purchase of peace, it is evidence of the fact which the town intended to admit. The legal principle applicable to a great variety of cases is that intent is the test. An offer of payment, whether accepted or rejected, is evidence, when the party making it understood it to be, and made it as, an admission of his liability. It is not evidence when he made it for the purpose of averting litigation, not intending to admit his liability. "If the object be to buy peace, it is plain such an offer carries with it no evidence of the justice of the demand; and it would have a tendency to prevent amicable adjustments, if such offers were to be used against the party making them." Marsh v. Gold, 2 Pick. 285, 290.

As his object could not be a matter of law, and he knows what it was, he may testify directly on that point. Confusion has arisen from reported cases in which the line between law and fact has not been clearly drawn. In Abbott v. Andrews, 180 Mass. 145, the question whether an offer of the plaintiff was an admission of a fact, or a mere effort to avoid controversy, was dealt with as a question of fact depending upon his purpose in making the offer, and the sense in which it was understood by both parties. But the result reached upon the examination of the evidence of purpose and understanding was not expressly stated to be a conclusion of fact.

In Sanborn v. Neilson, before cited, the alleged cause of action which the defendant had confessed was a criminal offense. The plea of "Not guilty" presented for trial the question that would be presented by the same plea to an indictment for the same act. If a retracted or executed offer of compensation was induced by a fear of a criminal prosecution and a hope of escaping or lessening the consequences, it would not be evidence in the criminal case. If induced by a fear of litigation and a hope of buying peace, without an intent to admit guilt, it would not be evidence in the civil case. There is no difference in the nature of the cases on which it could be held that the motive was a question of fact in one of them, and that the motive and intent were questions of law in the other.

When the evidence of intent is "conflicting, and the result doubtful," the question whether an offer of payment was an admission of liability may be submitted to the jury, with instructions that they are "to ascertain the meaning of the party making it, and . . . inquire and consider what were the views and intention of the defendant in making it; that if, viewing it in this way, they should find that" it "was intended by him as an admission of a fact, then it" is "to be considered by them as evidence; otherwise, they" will "lay it out of the case." Bartlett v. Hoyt, 83 N. H. 151, 154, 165, 166; Field v. Tenney, 47 N. H. 513, 515, 521; Hall v. Brown, 58 N. H. 93, 94, 98; Carr v. Ashland, 62 N. H. 665, 668. The same course may be taken with his payment of a claim like the plaintiff's presented by a third person. Eustman v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co. 44 N. H. 143, 145, 154, 82 Am. Dec. 201. The question that may be submitted to the jury is not a question of law, when it is decided by the court. If it is submitted to the jury, and they return a special verdict, finding the payment was or was not an admission of liability, the verdict on this point is set aside, when it is against the evidence. A finding of the same fact by the court is set aside for the same cause.

In Coffin v. Plymouth, 49 N. H. 173, the plaintiff, Mrs. Coffin, claimed damages of the town for a personal injury caused by the overturn of Mr. Clark's wagon, in which she was riding in a highway. Clark claimed damages of the town for the breakage of his wagon on the same occasion, spoke to the selectmen, or some of them, several times about it, and finally notified the chairman of the board that he should sue the town unless his claim was adjusted on or before a specified day. Thereupon, he was asked what was the least sum he would take to settle the matter, and he offered to take what he was obliged to pay for repairing the wagon, $25, which the first selectmen paid, protesting, at the time, that the town was not liable. Subject to exception, the payment of Clark's claim was received as an admission of liability. The whole of the reported decision on this subject is: "A majority of the court are of opinion that the evidence excepted to was properly admitted." No reason is given, and the only authority cited is Perkins v. Concord Railroad, 44 N. H. 223, which is not in point. In that case the ground of the decision was that liability was "distinctly admitted to the witness, as stated by him in evidence." In Coffin v. Plymouth, liability was distinctly denied. The validity of Clark's claim was a matter of opinion. However confident the defendants' belief that they were not liable, they might well act upon the assumption that the result of a trial was doubtful. Under the circumstances, the payment of a sum less than the irrecoverable expense of defending the threatened suit was conclusive evidence that the object of the payment was to buy a peace that would cost less than litigation. In the trial of Coffin's Case, there was no error of law, and the defendant's exception raised no question of law. The verdict could not be set aside without a motion based on an allegation that the finding of the court at the trial was in fact against the evidence. No such motion was made, and it does not appear that attention was called, at the law term, to the question of fact, which was the only question on which cause could be shown for a new trial. Whether the preliminary question of fact is decided by the judge, or submitted by him to the jury, "no exception lies, so far as the question is one of fact. If however, upon the evidence reported by the judge, it clearly appears that there was error in his finding, or in the finding of the jury, upon the matter of fact, it may be corrected, as in other cases where a verdict is against the evidence." State v. Squires, 48 N. H. 364, 369, 370.

In Grimes v. Keene, 52 N. H. 330, 334, it is said that payment of a claim for damages caused by the same accident is an admission, more or less strong, that the highway, at the point in question, was defective, and the town in fault for its being so; that such an admission is necessarily to be implied from the acknowledgment and payment of the claim, for without the defect there could have been no claim. "If payment of a claim against the town by the selectmen is an admission of the liability of the town, an unqualified offer to pay must be equally so." Gray v. Bollingsford, 58 N. H. 253, 254. "The town have offered to pay him $25. . . . But this is no proof that they owe him anything." Sikes v. Hatfield, 13 Gray, 847, 853. The amount paid or offered may be one of the circumstances to be weighed on the preliminary question, but the law does not make it the test. An entire claim may be paid to avoid a lawsuit, the payer intending to admit nothing but his desire for peace, the claimant understanding that nothing else is admitted, and both parties believing that the payer is not liable, or having no opinion on the subject. In such a case as Coffin v. Plymouth, a finding that the payment of an entire claim of $25 was anything more than a purchase of peace would be against the evidence. The proposition that an admission of liability is necessarily to be implied from the payment of a claim, or an offer to pay it, is contrary to the fact. "Compromise" generally signifies a settlement in which there is concession on both sides. Used in that sense, the word does not describe all cases in which peace is bought without an admission of liability, and is not an adequate statement of the law. In the present case the preliminary question of fact for the presiding justice at the trial was whether the defendants' payment of Mrs. Estes' claim in settlement of her suit was an admission of liability, or a mere purchase of peace. As it does not appear that a decision of that question of intent in favor of the defendant would be against the evidence, the exclusion of the payment is not a cause for a new trial.

In Aldrich v. Monroe, 60 N. H. 118, the plaintiff's omission of a usual precaution, of which he might be found to have had knowledge, was held to be evidence on the question whether he used reasonable care. In this case the warnings given by travelers, which the plaintiff offered to prove, were hearsay evidence of opinions concerning the sufficiency of the road at the place of the accident, and were rightly excluded.

Judgment on the verdict.

Clark, J., did not sit; Bingham, J., dissented; the others concurred.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

NEWARK MACHINE CO., Plff. in Err.,
v.

KENTON INSURANCE CO. of Kentucky.

(50 Ohio St. —.)

1. A valid contract of insurance may be made by parol, when not forbidden by statute, or a provision of the company's charter which has been brought to the knowledge of the other contracting party; and, as in other cases of parol contracts, the assent of the parties to the terms of the agreement may be shown by their acts and the attending circumstances, as well as by the words they have employed.

2. When nothing is said in the negotiations about special rates of insurance, or special conditions of the policy, it will be pre-

NOTE.—Validity of oral insurance contract.

There seems to have been some doubt and contrariety of opinion as to the validity of a parol contract of insurance. The last decision on the subject in some of the states even now indicates that such a contract would not be upheld, but the great weight of authority is that such contracts are valid.

In Bell v. Western M. & F. Ins. Co., 5 Rob. (La.) 423, 39 Am. Dec. 542, the court assumes that the contract of insurance must always be in writing.

And in Courtney v. Mississippi M. & F. Ins. Co., 12 La. 233, it decides that a parol contract of insurance is invalid.

In considering the question of reforming a policy to make it correspond to the alleged contract, the court said: "It is doubtless true that an insurance company cannot ordinarily insure by parol." Bishop v. Clay F. & M. Ins. Co. 49 Conn. 167.

In an early Missouri case it was stated that it would seem to be the settled opinion that a policy of insurance must be in writing. Plahto v. Merchants & Mfrs. Ins. Co. of St. Louis, 38 Mo. 243.

In Lindauer v. Delaware Mut. Safety Ins. Co., 18 Ark. 461, the court seems to be opposed to the validity of parol insurance.

By the Georgia code, the insurance and all changes in it must be in writing, and in order to permit the court to relieve one who has acted on a parol agreement it must appear that the act was in pursuance of the contract, on the faith of it, and induced by it. Simonton v. Liverpool, L. & G. Ins. Co. 51 Ga. 76.

In Cokerill v. Cincinnati Mut. Ins. Co., 16 Ohio, 143, it is stated that all insurance must be in writing.

But in Amazon Ins. Co. v. Wall, 31 Ohio St. 633, 27 Am. Rep. 533, it is stated that that decision was virtually overruled in Dayton Ins. Co. v. Kelly, 24 Ohio St. 345, 15 Am. Rep. 612.

sumed that those which were usual and customary were intended.

3. In determining whether there has been a delivery of a policy, effect will be given to the intention of the parties, and when the terms of an executed policy have been unconditionally accepted by the insured, and it has thereafter been treated as in force by the parties, its delivery will be regarded as complete, though it remain in the hands of the insurer's agent.

4. An agent authorized to make contracts of fire insurance and issue policies may waive payment in cash of the premiums, and give time for their payment, unless there are restrictions upon his authority of which the insured has notice; and such waiver may be express or implied.

5. Where, under an arrangement with

In Smith v. Odlin, 4 Yeates, 463, the judges refused to decide whether a parol insurance was valid or not.

In Kaines v. Knightly, Skinner, 55, it seems to be admitted that the insurance might be made by parol, but it is decided that if it is put in writing, evidence is not admissible to vary its terms by showing a different parol agreement.

In Perkins v. Washington Ins. Co., 4 Cow. 645, the company was held liable on a contract made by an agent for a fire occurring before the issuance of the policy, although there does not appear to have been more than a parol contract, accompanied by a receipt for the premium.

For the purposes of demonstrating that a waiver of a condition in a policy may be by parol, the court in Viele v. Germania Ins. Co., 26 Iowa, 2, 36 Am. Dec. 83, stated that the better opinion seems to be that the contract itself may be oral only.

In Rhodes v. Railway Pass. Ins. Co. of Hartford, 5 Lana. 71, it is held that a valid contract of insurance could be made by parol, but, if not under the circumstances of that case, there was a valid agreement to insure which would be enforced with the same effect in favor of the insured as though insurance had been actually effected.

In discussing the validity of a [parol] promise to renew a policy, the court, in Home Ins. Co. v. Adler, 71 Ala. 516, said that a parol insurance is valid.

In Ellis v. Albany City F. Ins. Co., 50 N. Y. 402, 10 Am. Rep. 495, where the question was as to whether or not a contract had been made, the court states that whatever doubts may formerly have been entertained as to the validity of parol contracts of insurance made by insurance corporations, authorized by their charters to make insurance by issuing policies, it is now settled that they are valid.

A contract of insurance can be made by parol unless prohibited by statute or other positive regula-the insured by which his insurance was to be kept up to a specified amount by renewals or new policies, it was the custom of the agent to charge the premiums as policies were issued, or renewed, and have periodical settlements with the insured, when the premiums would be paid, a credit for a premium so charged, to the next period of settlement, may be implied.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Licking County to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Kibler & Kibler, for plaintiff in error:

The principal questions in this case are covered by the decision by this court in the case of—

Germania F. Ins. Co. of N. Y. v. Shoemaker, 22 Ohio L. J. 815.

In view of that case the court below erred in saying that the verdict was against the evidence.

The policy could be accepted or ratified by the insured after the date of its issue, and it would be good when ratified and accepted, as the proof showed it was on July 8, 1884, and before the fire.

The proof was not only that the Norwich $5,000 was canceled, and that the agent of the plaintiff in error consented to the cancellation, but that plaintiff in error made no claim and was paid nothing upon the Norwich $5,000 policy.

Von Wien v. Scottish Union & Nat. Ins. Co. 118 N. Y. 84.

It was a question for the jury whether there was a delivery of the policy.

It is sometimes a question whether or not delivery of the policy has been made. But, of this, the manual delivery of the policy is not decisive. It depends rather upon the intention of the parties as manifested by their acts or agreements, for whatever the parties have agreed to as regards delivery, or whatever their conduct shows to have been considered as a delivery, controls.

The question was, What was the intent of Murphy as to the delivery of the policy? And he may testify to it.

Mr. R. D. Marshall, for defendant in error:

An offer by one party imposes no obligation upon another until accepted by him, according to the terms in which the offer is made.

May, Ins. § 50.

If there has been no payment of the premium and no delivery of policy, the contract is prima facie incomplete, and he who claims under it must show that it was the intention of the parties that it should be operative, notwithstanding these facts.

May, Ins. § 56.

To constitute a valid contract of insurance, the minds of the parties must meet as to the premises and the risk; as to the amount insured; as to the time risk shall continue; and as to the premium.

First Baptist Church Trustees v. Brooklyn F. Ins. Co. 28 N. Y. 153.

There was no cancellation of the policy of the Norwich Union.

May, Ins. §§ 67, 69.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts of the case, as shown by the record, and about which there is no controversy, are substantially as follows: On the 30th day of June, 1884, the plaintiff, a corporation, owned and was operating a large manufacturing plant in the city of Newark, and had been the owner and operator of it for several years. The defendant, a fire insurance company, then had an established agency in Newark, in the charge of H. D. Murphy, who was also the agent of a number of other fire insurance companies, among them the Norwich Union Company. He was a regularly commissioned agent of these companies, and was provided by them with blank applications, and policies duly signed by the proper officers, to be filled up and countersigned by him as agent, and delivered in the course of the business of his agency, and also with registers in which to keep a record of the business, and blanks for making reports of the same to the respective companies. He had, during the existence of his agency, issued a large number of policies of different companies represented by him, to the plaintiff, insuring its buildings, machinery, and stock against loss or damage by fire, one of which was a policy on the stock for five thousand dollars in the Norwich Union, issued a short time prior to June 30, 1884. There was an understanding between the managing officer of the plaintiff and Murphy, that the latter should keep the insurance of the plaintiff up to a certain amount, either by renewals, or new policies in good companies represented by him, and his course of dealing with the plaintiff under that understanding was to charge up the amount of the premiums to the plaintiff when policies were issued, or renewed, and have periodical settlements, usually once a month, when the premiums would be paid. The Norwich of the agent to make the contract. Angell v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 59 N. Y. 171, 17 Am. Rep. 322.

It seems to have been assumed that a parol contract might be made in Suydam v. Columbus Ins. Co. 18 Ohio, 459.

Charter or statutory provisions.

Of course the provisions of the charter or statute may preclude the right to make parol insurance, and such contracts would then be unenforceable. Statutes similar in language, but which are somewhat indefinite in terms have been differently construed by different courts.

If the charter of a mutual company provides that no one shall become a member until he has deposited his premium note, no parol contract, without the deposit of such note, can render the company liable. Belleville Mut. Ins. Co. v. Van Winkle, 12 N. J. Eq. 383.

Under rules of the company that no policy shall be binding until the premium is paid, a promise by the treasurer to an applicant for insurance that he will see that the premium is paid, if anything should happen, will not render the company liable. Buffum v. Fayette Mut. F. Ins. Co. 8 Allen, 380.

And a similar ruling was made in Mulrey v. Shawmut Mut. F. Ins. Co. 4 Allen, 116, 81 Am. Dec. 639.

In Somerset County Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. May, 2 W. N. C. 43, an equally divided court affirmed a judgment in favor of the applicant, where the one taking the application failed to notify the applicant of the rejection of the application, although a by-law of the company required the approval of two directors to every application in order to bind the company.

There can be no original and binding contract by parol, if the charter provides that all conditions shall be printed or written on the face of the policy, and the by-laws require that the president shall sign all contracts, and that all applications shall be in writing. Henning v. United States Ins. Co. 47 Mo. 425, 4 Am. Rep. 332.

But this decision has been modified if not wholly departed from by subsequent decisions from the same state. See Baile v. St. Joseph F. & M. Ins. Co. 73 Mo. 371; Linsenfelter v. Phoenix Ins. Co. of Hartford, Conn. 19 Mo. App. 253.

It has been held that—

A provision in the charter of a corporation that the contract shall be in writing or print and under the seal of the corporation does not prevent the making of a binding oral contract to issue a policy. Franklin F. Ins. Co. v. Colt, 37 U. S. 20 Wall. 560, 22 L. ed. 423.

A statute that insurance companies can make valid policies of insurance only by having them signed by the president and countersigned by the secretary does not prohibit the making of a valid oral agreement to insure. Commercial Mut. M. Ins. Co. v. Union Mut. Ins. Co. of N. Y. 60 U. S. 19 How. 318, 15 L. ed. 636, affirming Union Mut. Ins. Co. v. Commercial Mut. M. Ins. Co. 2 Curt. C. C. 524.

A provision of a charter that all conditions of the policies issued by the company shall be printed or written on the face of the policy and that certain named officers shall sign the policies or contracts made by order of the directors, will not prevent the company from making a valid oral contract. Henning v. United States Ins. Co. 2 Dill. 23.

A provision that in the absence of the president policies shall be signed by two directors does not prevent the making of parol contracts. Emery v. Boston Marine Ins. Co. 138 Mass. 398.

A statute requiring all policies to be signed does not prevent parol insurance. Walker v. Metropolitan Ins. Co. 56 Me. 371.

A provision of the charter that policies shall be

Union not desiring to carry so large an insurance on the plaintiff's stock, a few days prior to the 30th of June, 1884, directed Murphy to reduce its risk to $2,500. He, thereupon, on the 30th day of June, 1884, filled up, for that amount, one of the blank policies which that company had furnished him, duly signed by its proper officers, and countersigned it as agent, and at the same time filled up, for the same amount, one of the blank forms of policy with which the defendant company had supplied him, duly signed by its officers, and countersigned the same as its agent, ready for delivery. He made the customary entries of the issuing of the policies, in the registers of the respective companies, and in that of the Norwich Union an entry also of the cancellation of the five thousand dollar policy, in place of which the two policies he had so filled up were intended to be substituted. On the 2d day of July, 1884, he forwarded to the defendant, at its home office, in Covington, Kentucky, what is called a daily report, in which he gave the number of the policy he had written for the plaintiff, its date, amount, and duration, the rate and amount of the premium, a description of the property insured, and other particulars of the risk. This report was received at the home office July 3, 1884. The premium on the five thousand dollar policy had been fully paid by the plaintiff, and when the entry of its cancellation was made the policy had run but a short time. The unearned or return premium was carried to the credit of the plaintiff on the books of the agent, and the amount of the premiums due on the two new policies was charged to the plaintiff, by the agent, in accordance with his previous custom. At the next regular settlement between the plaintiff and the agent, which was made July 7, 1884, there was due him from the plaintiff, on account of premiums on various policies, the sum of $438.55, which amount included the balance due on the policy of the defendant. The amount due on the account was then paid by the plaintiff. When the policy of the defendant was written, and the cancellation entered of the Norwich Union policy, the latter was in the possession of F. S. Wright, cashier of the First National Bank of Newark, as collateral. Wright was also vice-president of the plaintiff, and looked after its insurance. On the 30th day of June, 1884, after writing and executing the two new policies, and entering the cancellation of the one for which they were intended to be substituted, the agent called at the bank to see Mr. Wright, take up the policy so held by him, and deliver the new ones in its place. Wright was absent, and the agent failed to see him. He called several times within the next day or two with like results, and did not see Wright until the evening of July 8, 1884, after the bank had closed. The agent then informed Wright that, at the request of the Norwich Union Co. he had canceled its policy for $5,000 which Wright then held, and issued to the plaintiff in its place, two other policies for $2,500 each, which he proposed to deliver, and take up the canceled policy.

Contract to insure.

In Commercial Ins. Co. v. Hallock, 27 N. J. L. 645, 72 Am. Dec. 379, the court said: "The bargain for insurance is treated as binding prior to the issuance of the policy, when there is a completed contract," without laying stress on whether the contract was in writing or not.

In considering the question of power to reform a policy, the court says a contract to insure may be by parol. Phoenix Ins. Co. of N. Y. v. Ryland, 1 L. R. A. 648, 69 Md. 437.

Agreements to insure enforced.

In some cases agreements to insure have been enforced, without anything in the case to show whether the contract was in writing or not. Carpenter v. Mutual Safety Ins. Co. 4 Sandf. Ch. 408, 7 L. ed. 1152; Hebert v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 13 Fed. Rep. 307.

Wright replied, that was all right, all he wanted was to have it so that the amount was the same, and he (the agent) could call at the bank any time when it was open, and make the exchange, and if he (Wright) was not in, the person in charge would make the exchange for him. There appears to have been no reason why the exchange was not made at the time of the interview on the evening of July 3, except that the bank was then closed. No claim was thereafter made by the plaintiff to the canceled policy; nor was there any question, at the trial, of Wright's authority to act for the plaintiff, or of that of the agent, Murphy, to act for the defendant. The property was totally destroyed by fire on the 5th day of July, 1880. At that time the new policies had not been actually delivered, or the old one taken up. Immediately after the fire, the defendant was notified of it by telegram from the agent, who received from the defendant the following response: "Yours received. Have telegraphed you for list of companies on stock with us. The list sent to Cincinnati made no mention of Kenton, and we were willing to be ignored. George C. Coker, Secretary." It was admitted on the trial, that proof of the loss was duly made and filed with the defendant; that Wright then had no interest in the claim, and, if the plaintiff was entitled to recover, the amount of the recovery should be $2,500 with interest from September 30, 1884.

It does not appear that the names of the companies in which the new policies had been written, were mentioned in the interview between Wright and the defendant's agent, nor the rate or amount of the premium, nor the duration or conditions of the policies; and it is claimed by the defendant that there was, therefore, no mutual assent of the parties to either of those terms, and so, no completed contract of insurance between them. It is undoubtedly true that those are essential elements of a contract of insurance, and if there was not a meeting of the minds of the parties upon them, the contract was not consummated, and no risk attached. But it is equally true that the agreement need not be expressed in words; it may be implied from the circumstances, and conduct of the parties.

If the case of Cockerill v. Cincinnati Mut. Ins. Co., 16 Ohio, 143, in which it was held that a policy of insurance, to be valid, must be in writing, was not virtually overruled by the case of Dayton Ins. Co. v. Kelly, 24 Ohio St. 845, as it was said to have been by Okey, J., in the case of Amazon Ins. Co. v. Wall, 81 Ohio St. 633, it has been so qualified by these subsequent cases as to limit the rule it announced to policies in their strict technical sense, and leave unaffected by it parol contracts of insurance.

It is now well settled that a policy is only evidence of the contract, and the latter may be shown by parol, when the policy has not been written, or is withheld, unless such contract is forbidden by statute, or a provision of the companies' charter which is brought to the notice of the other contracting party.

The issuance of a policy may be enforced. Woody v. Old Dominion Ins. Co. 31 Gratt. 322.

Specific performance may be compelled of an agreement to insure. Gerrish v. German Ins. Co. 55 N. H. 355; Kentucky Mut. Ins. Co. v. Jenks, 5 Ind. 96; Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Parrish, 73 Ill. 166; Franklin F. Ins. Co. v. Taylor, 52 Miss. 441.

The assured need not compel an execution of the policy, but may proceed immediately for the amount of the injury. Rockwell v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 4 Abb. Pr. 179.

Agreement to renew or extend the policy.

A parol agreement to renew an existing policy is enforceable. Springer v. Anglo-Nevada & Assur. Corp. 38 N. Y. S. R. 543; Post v. Aetna Ins. Co. 43 Barb. 361; Scott v. Home Ins. Co. 53 Wis. 238.

An agreement to renew a policy which expires about ten months after the agreement is made, is not void as not to be performed within a year, although it provides for the renewal each year afterwards so as to constitute a permanent risk. *First Baptist Church Trustees v. But it has been held that—

A promise to renew will not support an action, unless the premium was paid or tendered. Crogham v. Underwriters' Agency of N. Y. 53 Ga. 109.

Contract not fully completed.

A receipt for the premium may be sufficient to evidence the contract. Lightbody v. North American Ins. Co. 23 Wend. 18.

If, after an agreement to insure, the policy is made out and left in the possession of the agent for a month, the question is for the jury whether or not a reasonable time had expired, and if so whether or not reasonable exertions had been made to give notice that the policy was ready for acceptance and payment expected; and if such is found to be the case the contract may be treated as at an end. *Baxter v. English decisions.

Co.* 20 Ohio, 529, 537. And, as in other cases of parol contracts, the terms of the agreement, and the assent of the parties to them, may be shown by their acts, and the attending circumstances, as well as the words they have employed. There was, in this case, no express agreement in regard to the property to be insured by the new policies. The property was not mentioned in the interview between the defendant's agent and Wright. But, as it was agreed the new policies were to be exchanged for the canceled policy, it must have been as clearly understood as if it had been expressly stated, that they were to cover the property included in the canceled policy. So, in regard to the rate and amount of the premium, and form and conditions of the policy. It is not claimed that the conditions of the defendant's policies, or its rate of insurance are different from those of like companies; and, it is generally known that the form and conditions of fire policies in use by good companies do not differ substantially, and the rates of insurance are established, and uniform on the same classes of property. And where nothing is said, in the negotiation for insurance, about special rates or conditions, it may be presumed that those which were usual and customary, were intended. In Richards on Insurance, 2d ed. section 42, it is laid down, as a general rule, that "whether the contract of insurance is closed by parol or by a preliminary binding receipt, the legal presumption is that the usual policy is to follow." And in the preceding section, the same author says, that it is not necessary that all the particulars of a contract should be made the subject of express stipulation, "for it may well be understood, in the absence of express declaration to the contrary, that the usual form of policy is acceptable to both parties." It was held by the Supreme Court of Minnesota, in Salisbury v. Hekla Fire Ins. Co. of Madison, 32 Minn. 460, that, "upon an oral contract of insurance, where nothing is said about conditions, if a policy is to be issued, the parties are presumed to intend that it shall contain the conditions usually inserted in policies of insurance in like cases." And in Eames v. Home Ins. Co. of N. Y., 94 U. S. 629, 24 L. ed. 301, Mr. Justice Bradley, says: "It is sufficient if one party proposes to be insured, and the other party agrees to insure, and the subject, the period, the amount and the rate of insurance is ascertained or understood, and the premium paid if demanded. It will be presumed that they contemplate such form of policy, containing such conditions and limitations as are usual in such cases, or have been used before between the parties. This is the sense and reason of the thing, and any contrary requirement should be expressly notified to the party to be affected by it."

Upon the facts of the present case, there can be but little doubt that the contract of insurance made by the defendant through its pany liable on a policy executed after the loss of the ship had been reported, the court said: "Equity would have compelled the execution of the policy in accordance with the agreement which had been previously made."

But under 80 Vict., chap 23, no marine insurance is valid, unless contained in a stamped policy. Ionides v. Pacific F. & M. Ins. Co. L. R. 6 Q. B. 674, 41 L. J. Q. B. 58, 25 L. T. N. S. 490, L. R. 7 Q. B. 517, 41 L. J. Q. B. 190, 26 L. T. N. S. 738, 21 Week. Rep. 22.

So an agreement to execute a marine policy cannot be enforced. Fisher v. Liverpool Marine Ins. Co. L. R. 8 Q. B. 469, 42 L. J. Q. B. 224, 28 L. T. N. S. 387, 22 Week. Rep. 13.

The above statute and decisions do not seem to apply, however, to fire policies.

In Morocco Land & Trading Co. v. Fry, 11 Jur. N. S. 76, 11 L. T. N. S. 618, 18 Week. Rep. 310, the court refused to compel the execution of a policy in accordance with the insurer's slip.

But in Christie v. North British Ins. Co., 3 Shaw & D. 360, it is intimated that insurance might be effected without the delivery of a policy; but it is held that the agent's statement that the applicant might hold himself insured would not support an action as upon a policy, whether it would support another kind of action or not.

In Mackie v. European Ins. Co., 21 L. T. N. S. 108, 17 Week. Rep. 367, the company was held liable on a binding receipt for the value of property burned before the policy issued.

So it has been held that the binding slip on an unstamped instrument may constitute a fire contract. Thompson v. Adams, L. R. 23 Q. B. Div. 361.

In Jones v. Provincial Ins. Co., 16 U. C. Q. B. 477, an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due for a fire loss was held not to be maintainable because no policy had issued. The court intimated that no insurance could be effected by 22 L. R. A.

parol; but that there might be an action for failure to deliver the policy, or in equity to compel specific performance.

The date of the issuance of the slip and not that of the policy is to be regarded in determining the question of concealment. Lishman v. Northern M. Ins. Co. L. R. 10, C. P. 179; Cory v. Patton, L. R. 7 Q. B. 304.

Presumption as to powers of agent.

An agent of an insurance company is presumed, in favor of third parties, to have power to bind the company by parol contracts for insurance. Bauble v. Aetna Ins. Co. 2 Dill. 156; Taylor v. Germania Ins. Co. 2 Dill. 223.

But the authority of an agent to make parol contracts of insurance will not be presumed. Aetna Ins. Co. v. North Western Iron Co. 21 Wis. 453.

Cases not in point.

There are cases in which the question of the validity of parol insurance has been raised but which have gone off on other points so as to leave that question undecided.

In Putnam v. Home Ins. Co., 123 Mass. 324, 25 Am. Rep. 93, the question was as to the authority of the agent to make a temporary parol contract which would bind the company.

For the purposes of determining the priority between two policies the date of the parol contract must be considered. Hubbard v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 33 Iowa, 325, 11 Am. Rep. 123.

There are many cases in which suits have been held not maintainable on the ground that no contract had been perfected between the parties. Of this class of cases the following are examples. Myers v. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. 121 Mass. 333; Sargent v. National F. Ins. Co. 36 N. Y. 623; O'Reilly v. London Assur. Corp. 101 N. Y. 575. H. P. F.

agent, with the plaintiff, was complete in all its terms. The plaintiff had previously arranged with the agent to keep its insurance up to a certain amount, in good companies for which he was authorized to act. This arrangement virtually left the selection of the companies to the discretion of the agent; and, acting under it, he had written the policy of the defendant and the new policy of the Norwich Union Company, each for $2,500, and duly countersigned both ready for delivery to the plaintiff, and entered the cancellation of the policy which Wright had in his possession, before the interview of July 3. The policy of the defendant was then complete, containing a description of the property, the amount, commencement, and duration of the risk, the rate and amount of the premium, and all the terms and conditions usual in such policies. This policy, and the new policy of the Norwich Union, the agent proposed to Wright to exchange for the canceled policy, without condition or qualification. The proposition was immediately assented to, and accepted, without any qualification or condition whatever. The terms of the contract of insurance thus proposed by the defendant, through its agent, were definite and certain in every particular; they were those set forth in the policy. The acceptance was as broad as the proposition, and was therefore an acceptance of all the terms and conditions of the policy as it was written. That the plaintiff chose to accept the proposition, unqualifiedly, without further inquiry or examination, affords the defendant no ground for claiming the contract was, on that account, incomplete. The only reason the exchange was not then made was, that the canceled policy was locked up in the bank. The parties evidently regarded the exchange as complete; and thereafter, the agent was a mere custodian of the policy in question, for the plaintiff, and the actual handing of it over was not essential to the risk. Effect will be given to the intention of the parties; and what their conduct shows they considered a delivery, must control, in determining whether it was made. Biddle, Ins. § 149; Dibble v. Northern Assur. Co. of London, 70 Mich. 1; Bodine v. Exchange F. Ins. Co. of N. Y. 51 N. Y. 117, 10 Am. Rep. 566; 11 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 285.

It is quite evident the agent considered the policy of the defendant in full force. He reported it as such to the company; and that the latter so treated it, even after the fire, is shown by its telegram to the agent, inquiring what companies were "on stock with us." The policy was on the stock of the plaintiff in its manufactory. The manual surrender by Wright, of the policy in his possession, was not, we think, necessary to effect its cancellation. His assent to the cancellation made by the agent was sufficient. It then ceased to be of any force, and was so treated by the parties.

The only other ground upon which it is claimed the defendant is not liable is, that the premium was not paid until after the loss occurred. Murphy was the duly commissioned agent of the defendant, authorized to make contracts of insurance, collect premiums, and issue and renew policies; and, to that end, was furnished by the defendant with printed forms of policies, signed in blank by the president and secretary of the company, to enable him, without conference with them, to countersign and issue the policies in behalf of the company. It is well settled that such an agent is the general agent of the company, and may, in his dealings with those he insures, waive payment in cash, of the premiums, and, indeed, any of the conditions of the policy, except when a restriction upon his authority is in some way brought to the knowledge of the insured. In a recent and valuable work on insurance, it is said, that a fire policy "does not ordinarily make the payment of the premium a condition precedent to the validity of the contract, and a general agent may of course extend credit to the insured, or not, as he chooses. The general custom where credit is given, is for the agent to do so on his own responsibility. But in case the agent should make default in accounting to the company the policy will nevertheless be valid. And though the policy provide that it shall not take effect until the premium is paid in cash, the general agent has power to waive the premium, and will be held to have waived it if he delivers the policy without enforcing payment." Richards, Ins. 2d ed. § 95. And in section 98 of the same work, that author says: "An agent of a life company who is intrusted with the business of closing the contract by delivering the policy is held to have an implied authority to determine how the premium then due shall be paid, whether by cash, or, as is sometimes done, by giving credit, in which case the agent becomes the creditor of the insured, and the debtor of insurer. In that event, though the agent subsequently defaulted and the money never reached the company, the policy would still be binding. By the weight of authority the agent is held to have this discretionary power, although the policy in terms denies it; but this is based upon his possession of the document for purposes of delivery, and his instructions to deliver it, and consequently his power does not extend to subsequent premiums or premium notes." Bodine v. Exchange F. Ins. Co. of N. Y. 51 N. Y. 117, 10 Am. Rep. 566. The authorities on this subject are extensively collected in that very convenient, and almost indispensable work, The American and English Encyclopedia of Law, vol. 11, page 833. The waiver of the payment of the premium in cash is an act within the exercise of the agent's general authority to issue policies and collect the premiums, and such waiver may be either express or implied. And when, as in the case before us, it has been the custom of the agent, under an arrangement with the insured by which the latter's insurance should be kept up to a certain amount by renewals or new policies, to charge the insured with the premiums as policies were issued or renewed, and have periodical settlements, when the premiums would be paid, a credit for a premium so charged, to the next period of settlement may be fairly implied.

We see no reason, upon the facts of this case, why the plaintiff should not recover, as it did in the court of common pleas.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is therefore reversed, and that of the Common Pleas affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA.

v.

Mayor and Council of MACON.

(.....Fed. Rep.)

1. A license tax of $500 per annum imposed on every person selling in a city any meat which is not from animals of his own raising, unless he rents a stall in a public market, while the rent of such stall is $150 per year and the market regulations are so restricted and burdensome as to preclude the reasonable conduct of a wholesale business there, is unconstitutional in respect to wholesale dealers in meat brought from other states, by reason of the necessarily resulting discrimination against them, although the ordinances on the subject on their face purport to apply to vendors irrespective of the places from which it comes,—especially where neither sales nor inspection of meat are restricted to the market, and the regulations are clearly made for the purpose of revenue and not merely to prevent the sale of uninspected meat.

3. The enforcement of city ordinances which attempt an unconstitutional interference with interstate commerce may be restrained by injunction from a federal court.

(August 2, 1896.)

SUIT to enjoin defendants from enforcing against complainants the provisions of a city ordinance regulating the sale of dressed meats. Judgment in favor of complainants.

Statement by Speer, J.:

The complainants are wholesale and retail butchers in the city of Macon, in this district. They supply meats to the people of Macon and the surrounding country, dealing exclusively in dressed meats. They do not slaughter. Five sixths of the meats they furnish their customers are cattle reared in western states, killed and dressed there, and shipped in refrigerating cars to Macon. These are of a better quality than the meats obtained in the country contiguous to Macon, and the complainants state for that reason would naturally be regarded with more favor by the public, if the complainants had the equal protection of the laws; but complainants insist that this is not the case, for that the mayor and council of the city of Macon are depriving them of the equal protection of the laws, and of due process of law, and of the right they have to conduct their business conformably to law. The gravamen of the complaint is that on the second day of June, 1888, certain market regulations were enacted for Macon; market hours were prescribed, as follows: In winter from daylight until ten o'clock. In summer from 8 A. M. to 9 A. M. By the municipal law, winter begins October 1, and summer, April 1; but on Saturdays the market house is open from 8 o'clock P. M. to 8 o'clock P. M. in winter, and 9 o'clock in summer. These regulations further provide that it is unlawful to sell or offer for sale any meats on the streets or elsewhere in the city of Macon during said market hours, and heavy penalties are prescribed for a violation of this rule. Stalls are rented in the market, but none for a sum less than $150 per annum, but although a butcher may rent a stall, yet his business is practically destroyed for the ordinance provides that no person shall be permitted to buy more at the market than is necessary for the use of his or her family, except during the last hour of the market hours, and further that no person shall sell, or contract to sell, to any one, any article of produce or meat which is to be delivered after market hours, outside of the market building. Not only, therefore, is complainants' business cut off elsewhere during the market hours, but even as renters of stalls they claim they are so hindered and limited as to prevent them from selling meats in any considerable amount to those who are willing to buy. It is further provided by the market ordinances that all persons, not renting a stall at the market for the sale of meat, and who shall sell any kind of meat on the streets of the city of Macon, at any time during the day or night, shall pay a license tax of $500 per annum, said license to be paid in advance; provided, this section shall not apply to farmers bringing into the city for the purpose of sale the flesh of any animal raised by themselves after market hours. By this last clause we may safely presume it is meant that it shall not apply to farmers bringing into the city for the purpose of sale, after market hours, the flesh of any animal raised by themselves.

It is further provided that after the expiration of market hours every person having any product or article for sale shall remove the same from the market place. On account of this last provision, the complainants complain that they are forced to haul their meats to and from the market at great trouble, expense, and annoyance. That on account of the restrictions and hindrances above mentioned, although the market hours constitute the principal portion of the day when the people have ordinarily been accustomed to make their purchases of meat, yet the sales at the market do not constitute one half of the sales at retail made after market hours at the complainants' respective places of business elsewhere in the town, so that a large part of their capital and time are wasted during market hours. That the ordinance further provides "that a license shall be imposed on butchers or others who have no stall in the market and who shall sell from any shop or wagon (other than nonresidents selling meats of their own raising); and no license shall be issued for less than five hundred dollars." This, it is alleged, is a discrimination in favor of the producers, of meat raised in the country tributary to Macon, and against meat producers who make their products in the western markets, and ship them for sale to Georgia.

NOTE.—The opinion in the above case very fully presents the subject of license taxes as affecting interstate commerce in meat, and illustrates it by a striking instance of an unlawful attempt to restrict such trade.

The license tax, exclusive of the market ordinance, for the year 1893 upon wholesale dealers in meat, selling to the trade only, is $25.

Complainants aver that the wholesale meat trade in Macon handles western meats only. There is not enough meat produced in the country around Macon to create a wholesale business, and the tax operates to put a burden upon interstate commerce and to give an undue advantage to dealers in meats raised near Macon. If the complainants should not rent a stall in the market house under these ordinances, they must pay a license of $500, even though they sell only after the market hours are over, while farmers from the surrounding country may retain meats brought into the city without any license whatever. The market ordinance, undertaking to prevent the sale of meat on the streets of the city of Macon outside of market hours expressly recognizes such sales. It is not, therefore, an ordinance intended to prevent the selling of meats on any particular street or in any particular locality. Nor does it provide for the inspection of meats elsewhere than at the market, and in point of fact the officials of the city have at no time undertaken to inspect meats elsewhere than in the market house. It is, then, not an ordinance, made for the protection of health, or for the inspection of meats, or for compelling the sale of meats in a particular locality, which might be done under the exercise of the police power; but that under the guise of police regulation, it is an ordinance wholly for the collection of a revenue. That as such it is in violation of the constitution of the state of Georgia and of the United States, in that it prescribes a cheaper license tax for those who sell in the market and at their regular place of business, than for those who sell at their regular place of business, and no tax at all for farmers selling in the city after market hours, while handlers of western meats, not stall holders, must pay a tax of $500 to sell in the city after market hours. The constitution of the state of Georgia provides that "all taxation shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects." The Constitution of the United States provides that "the citizens of the different states shall be entitled to the equal protection of the laws."

One of the complainants, W. L. Henry, has already been arrested for offering wholesome western meats for sale at his place of business and selling during market hours, and was tried before the recorder of the mayor and council of the city of Macon, on the charge that he had sold meat at his said place of business during the aforesaid market hours, and was fined $25 and costs. This was appealed to the supreme court of the state which court held that the ordinance was valid. The mayor and council of the city of Macon threaten to continue to arrest and fine complainants every time they undertake to sell, or offer for sale, during market hours, any meats, at their said places of business.

Complainants further aver that they will each be damaged in very large amounts, exceeding the sum or value of $2,000, exclusive of costs.

The bill prays that the court will grant a writ of injunction perpetually enjoining and restraining the defendants, their clerks, attorneys, agents, servants, and employes from enforcing or endeavoring to enforce against complainants any penalty provided in said ordinances for selling or offering for sale any of said meats at their respective places of business or elsewhere in the city of Macon, otherwise than at said market house, or from selling their meats at any time during said market hours; and be further enjoined from collecting or attempting to collect the license fee fixed by said ordinances for the sale of meats elsewhere than in said market house; and further from interfering with complainants for selling at any time during market hours such meats as they may have to offer for sale, to all persons who may there desire to buy, and that said market ordinances may be decreed to be unconstitutional and void. They ask for a provisional injunction pendente lite.

The mayor and council of the city of Macon demur to the bill for want of jurisdiction in this court upon the ground that all the parties are citizens of the state of Georgia, and further, because it does not appear that a question is raised depending upon the violation of any part of the Constitution of the United States; and they answer that they have the right to regulate the selling of meat in the city of Macon, and to confine the sales thereof to the market house in said city during market hours. They further answer that they have the right to fix a license for the sale of meats and other articles in said city. They deny that the effect of the licenses so fixed by them in any way violates the Constitution or the statutes of the United States.

No preliminary injunction was granted, and the facts not being in dispute, the court has taken under advisement the matters presented by the bill, the answer, and the demurrer.

Mr. Marion Erwin for complainants.
Mr. R. W. Patterson for defendants.

Speer, J., delivered the following opinion:

It will be observed from the averments of the bill that there is no attempt to prohibit the sales of meats elsewhere than in the market house of the city. The ordinances in question, therefore, are not directed towards the avoidance of the green grocers and butcher shops. It cannot, we think, be denied that it is within the power of the city to fix one or more localities for the sale of meat. This may be done to facilitate inspection but since by permission of the city a very large amount of the meat is sold at the butcher shops, and places of business, elsewhere than in the market, it is evident that the prohibition of sales during market hours at such places is not intended to prevent sales of un-inspected meat. It is true it appears, in point of fact, that the city authorities do not inspect meats except at the market house, yet the ordinance authorizes them so to do. After providing that "no person shall sell any article not wholesome for food," it provides that "the clerk and inspector shall seize any such article he may find in the market and cause it to be destroyed, and the offender shall be punished, etc." The meaning of the word "market" in this sense cannot be market house, but in its broadest sense relates to and embraces all articles of food offered for purchase or sale in the city. The city law, therefore, expressly authorizes the maintenance of butcher shops at any place in the city, and further provides for the inspection of meats at such places. It cannot then be satisfactorily argued that these regulations are made, either to compel the concentration of the meat business at the market house or to facilitate the inspection of meats. If in order to facilitate inspection, the ordinance had expressly forbidden the sales of meats in the city, elsewhere than at the market house, it might not have been difficult to sustain its constitutionality, even though it might have gravely interfered with interstate commerce. Such an ordinance would seem to be within the legitimate police powers of the city. Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 36, 21 L. ed. 894; Butchers Union, S. H. & L. S. L. Co. v. Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. 111 U. S. 748, 28 L. ed. 585. But the ordinance not being of this character, the argument in its support based upon that theory must logically fail. vide opinion of Mr. Justice Harlan in Minnesota v. Barber, 136 U. S. 329, 34 L. ed. 461, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 185. vide also Spellman v. New Orleans, 45 Fed. Rep. 8; Ex parte Kieffer, 40 Fed. Rep. 399.

It is not disputed that the business conducted by the complainants is almost entirely that of selling meats raised in the western states. These meats are transported to Macon and stored and offered for sale by means of refrigerating apparatus. Complainants thus engaged must in obedience to the ordinance rent a stall in the market and pay $150 therefor. They must, if engaged as wholesale dealers, also pay a license tax of $25 for the privilege of carrying on their business. From these burdens, one who deals in meats produced in the surrounding country is wholly exempt. Not only is this true, but in the most important hours for that purpose, during the day, the complainants are denied the right of making sales of any amount, for the reason that their places of business elsewhere than in the market house must be closed, and in the market house they are permitted to sell to any one person no more than enough for consumption in one day, while this is true, the producers of meat in this state may sell before and after market hours any amount they please, without the imposition of any tax or license charge whatever. It cannot be denied that the effect of this discrimination operates severely against the sale of meat produced in other states, and whatever may be the power of the city government to discriminate between the producers of meat in the surrounding country, and those who sell the same meat in the city, they have no power to make a regulation which operates in favor of home products and against the production of other states, and such regulations are in contravention of the Constitution of the United States. Nor does it matter how such regulations are denominated or how they are expressed. In the case of Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 347, it was declared by the Supreme Court that a license tax, required for the sale of goods is in effect a tax upon the goods themselves; and further that the statute of Missouri which required the payment of a license tax from persons who deal in the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise, which are not the growth, produce, or manufacture of the state, by going from place to place to sell the same in the state and requires no such license tax from persons selling in a similar way goods which are the growth, produce, or manufacture of the state, is in conflict with the power vested in congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states. They hold further that this power protects property, "which is transported as an article of commerce from foreign countries, or among the states, from hostile or interfering state legislation until it has mingled with or become a part of the general property of the country, and protects it even after it has entered a state from any burdens imposed by reason of its foreign origin." The decision itself was pronounced by that venerable and illustrious jurist, Mr. Justice Field, who for years has devoted his undoubted genius to an unswerving defense of what he has deemed to be the rights of the states against encroachments of the national authority. It will not be denied he declares that that portion of commerce with foreign countries and between the states which consists in the transportation and exchange of commodities is of national importance, and admits and requires uniformity of regulation. The very object of investing this power in the general government was to insure this uniformity against discriminating state legislation. The depressed condition of commerce and the obstacles to its growth previous to the adoption of the constitution, from the want of some single controlling authority, has been frequently referred to by this court in commenting upon the power in question. "It was regulated," says Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion in Brown v. Maryland, "by foreign nations, with a single view to their own interests; and our disunited efforts to counteract their restrictions were rendered impotent by want of combination. Congress indeed, possessed the power of making treaties; but the inability of the federal government to enforce them became so apparent as to render that power in a great degree useless. Those who felt the injury arising from this state of things, and those who were capable of estimating the influence of commerce on the prosperity of nations, perceived the necessity of giving the control of this important subject to a single government. It may be doubted whether any of the evils proceeding from the feebleness of the federal government contributed more to that great revolution which introduced the present system than the deep and general conviction that commerce ought to be regulated by congress." 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 446, 6 L. ed. 688. He continues: "The power of the state to exact a license tax of any amount being admitted, no authority would remain in the United States or in this court to control its action, however unreasonable or oppressive. Imposts operating as an absolute exclusion of the goods would be possible, and all the evils of discriminating state legislation, favorable to the interests of one state and injurious to the interests of other states and countries, which existed previous to the adoption of the constitution, might follow, and the experience of the last fifteen years shows would follow, from the action of some of the states." What a state may not do, it may not authorize a city to do. Mr. Justice Miller in his luminous and valuable lectures on the Constitution, upon exhaustive consideration of authority expresses the same conclusions. Miller, Const. §§ 9, 433-473.

In the case of Voight v. Wright, 141 U. S. 62, 35 L. ed. 638, the Supreme Court passed on this state of facts: The state of Virginia had enacted a statute which provided that all flour brought into the state and offered for sale therein shall be reviewed, and have the Virginia inspection marked thereon, and imposing a penalty for offering such flour for sale without such review or inspection. The court held this to be repugnant to the commerce clause of the constitution, because it is a discriminating law, requiring the inspection of flour brought from other states when it is not required for flour manufactured in Virginia.

In the case of Brimmer v. Rebman, 188 U. S. 78, 84 L. ed. 862, 8 Inters. Com. Rep. 485, Mr. Justice Harlan delivering the opinion of the court remarked: "Undoubtedly a state may establish regulations for the protection of its people against the sale of unwholesome meats, provided such regulations do not conflict with the powers conferred by the constitution upon congress, or infringe on those granted and secured by that instrument. But it may not under the guise of exerting its police powers enact inspection laws and make discriminations against the products and industries of some states in favor of the products and industries of its own or other states. The owner of the meats here in question, although they were from animals slaughtered in Illinois, had the right under the constitution to compete in the markets of Virginia upon terms of equality with the owners of like meats from animals slaughtered in Virginia or elsewhere within one hundred miles from the place of sale. Any regulation which, in terms or by its necessary operation denies this equality in the markets of the state is, when applied to the people and the products or industries of other states, a direct burden upon commerce among the states and therefore void." Of this case we may say, in the language of Justice Bradley: "The decision in the case is so directly apposite to the present that it is unnecessary to prolong the discussion or to cite further authorities." Voight v. Wright, supra.

It is clearly evident that the local regulations of the city of Macon, imposing a tax of $500, or $150 and other restrictions on the selling of western meats and nothing of the kind on the sale by producers of their own meats raised in this state, by its necessary operation, denies to the former equality in the markets of his state and is a direct burden upon the commerce among the states and is therefore void. See also Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465, 24 L. ed. 527. The language of the ordinance is: "All persons not renting a stall at the market for the sale of meat, and who shall sell any kind of meat on the streets of the city of Macon at any time during the day or night, shall pay a license tax of $500 per annum, such license to be paid in advance: Provided this section shall not supply to farmers bringing into the city for the purpose of sale the flesh of any animal raised by themselves after market hours," and the Tax Ordinance of 1893, as follows: "Be it ordained by the mayor and council of the city of Macon and it is hereby ordained by authority of the same, that the following licenses and special taxes shall be levied and collected in the city of Macon for the year 1893: Butchers and others who have no stall in the market and who shall sell from shop or wagon, other than nonresidents selling meats of their own raising, and no license shall issue for less than five hundred dollars." It is true, the tax ordinance excepts from its verbal operation "nonresidents selling meats of their own raising," but since it is evident that only persons who can avail themselves of this privilege are nonresidents who live in the immediate vicinity of Macon, it effectually excludes meat producers from all the other states.

Nor is this conclusion to be avoided merely because this enactment purports to apply alike to the vendors of meat in this state as well as to meats produced in other states, for "the burden imposed by a state upon interstate commerce is not to be sustained simply because the statute imposing it applies alike to the people of all the states, including the people of the state enacting such statute." Brimmer v. Rebman, supra.

The case of Osborne v. Mobile, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 479, 21 L. ed. 470, which seems to hold a contrary doctrine, has been overruled in later decisions. See Leloup v. Mobile, 127 U. S. 640, 32 L. ed. 811, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 134; Asher v. Texas, 128 U. S. 129, 32 L. ed. 368, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 241; Crutcher v. Kentucky, 141 U. S. 47, 35 L. ed. 649.

It follows also that the wholesale tax for the business of meat selling within the city of Macon is void, the evidence showing that this business depends entirely upon the sale of western meats, there being no pretense of imposing a tax on home-made meats sold in bulk.

For the foregoing reasons the defendants must be enjoined from collecting these taxes. Because their regulations are also unconstitutional as imposing an unlawful restriction upon commerce between the states, they must be restrained from enforcing or endeavoring to enforce the penalties provided in the ordinances for selling or offering for sale their meats at their regular places of business, or elsewhere in the city of Macon, otherwise than at the market house, and from selling their meats at any time during market hours, as prohibited in said ordinances, and from collecting or attempting to collect from complainants the license fee fixed by such ordinances, for the sale of meats elsewhere than in the market house; and must be further enjoined from preventing the complainants, who have rented stalls at the market house, from selling at the market house as much of their meats as they may have the opportunity to sell to any and all persons who may there desire to buy. That in so far as the said market ordinances are intended to support these restrictions they are unconstitutional and void.

Let the demurrer be overruled, and the answer be declared insufficient.

Carey WATSON et al.

(.....Tex.....)

Statutory authority to a married woman to convey her separate property by joining with her husband will not extend to an implied covenant of warranty so as to make such deed, at least in the absence of an express covenant, operate on an after-acquired interest in the property, when she owned only an undivided portion at the time of the conveyance.

(December 4, 1893.)

NOTE.—Effect of covenants of married women and their estoppel by deed or mortgage.

Liability on covenant.

A married woman is not liable on her covenants in a deed or mortgage made jointly by herself, and husband in the absence of statute imposing such liability. Benton County v. Rutherford, 33 Ark. 640; Wadleigh v. Gilnea, 6 N. H. 17, 23 Am. Dec. 706; Nicholson v. Hemsley, 3 Harr. & MoH. 400; Aldridge v. Burison, 3 Blackf. 201; Whitbeck v. Cook, 15 Johns. 490, 8 Am. Dec. 372; Sawyer v. Little, 4 Vt. 414; Fletcher v. Coleman, 2 Head, 384; Foster v. Wilcox, 10 R. L. 443, 14 Am. Rep. 693; Porter v. Bradley, 7 R. L. 539; Dean v. Shelly, 57 Pa. 428, 98 Am. Dec. 235; Falmouth Bridge Co. v. Tibbatts, 16 B. Mon. 688; Lyon v. Metcalf, 12 Iowa, 33; Strawn v. Strawn, 50 Ill. 33; Colcord v. Swan, 7 Mass. 291; Shelton v. Deering, 10 B. Mon. 406; Den v. Crawford, 8 N. J. L. 109.

And the same was stated in Nunnally v. White, 3 Met. (Ky.) 593, but was not the question decided.

And the same was stated in Barker v. Circle, 60 Mo. 256, but the court held in that case that she had not acquired a paramount title but simply the legal title after she had conveyed the equitable title by deed of trust, and in such a case the trustee took all her estate and the subsequent deed to her inured to the vendee under her deed of trust.

And Beal v. Beal, 79 Ind. 280, holds that while 1 Ind. Rev. Stat. 1876, p. 383, provides that a wife is not bound by the covenant in her deed, yet if she and her husband convey by warranty her land and take a note for the purchase money when she had no title to part of the same, she is estopped from taking advantage of her own wrong and there is a failure of consideration for the note.

But in Wotton v. Hele, 3 Saund. 180, 1 Mod. 291, which was a transfer by fine and recovery, it was held that a warranty by husband and wife annexed QUESTIONS certified by the court of Civil Appeals for the Fifth Supreme Judicial District for the opinion of the Supreme Court in an action brought to try title to certain real estate, in which verdict and judgment had been rendered in favor of defendants. Answers returned favorable to plaintiffs.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. R. R. Hazlewood, C. H. Smith, and Schluter & Allday, for appellants:

A deed which contains no covenants of warranty, and which contains no recital or affirmation, expressed or implied, that the grantor is seised of the entire estate in the property conveyed, will not pass an after-acto an estate for years in the feme will bind her, and an action of covenant will lie against her after his death, the report saying the court all thought an action "well lay against the defendant on her warranty in the fine although she was a covert-baron and they did not make any scruple of it." The transfer by fine and recovery was abolished in England by Stat. 3 & 4 Wm. IV., chap. 74.

And in Amos v. Cosby, 74 Ga. 793, it was held that a married woman having a right to make a joint warranty deed with her husband, of a homestead set apart to him under the Act of 1868, is equally bound on her covenant of warranty against prior liens, as she was a usee, and not a surety of the husband.

This case seems to be exceptional and it neither cites any authorities nor discusses the question further than is stated.

And in Arthur v. Caverly (Mich.) Dec. 8, 1893, it was held that a married woman uniting with her husband in a warranty deed of his property is liable on the covenant where she obtains all the consideration, which in that case was a conveyance to her of other property. This was on the ground that she was contracting with respect to property to be held by her as separate property and which may be bound by her contract in Michigan.

And in Hobbs v. King, 2 Met. (Ky.) 139, while it was said that a feme covert cannot bind herself by warranty, yet it was held that she has power to convey and pass over her estate, and her grantor by warranty will be bound to her grantee under her warranty.

But under Iowa Rev. Stat. 1870, § 2506, providing that contracts may be made by the wife as though she was single, a married woman is liable on her covenants of warranty in a deed of her own land, Richmond v. Tibbles, 26 Iowa, 474.

And she is thus liable in Massachusetts since the Act of 1845. Basford v. Pearson, 7 Allen, 504.

quired title, nor estop the grantor nor those claiming under him from claiming the after-acquired title, although such deed assumes to convey the entire estate by metes and bounds.

Sayles, Civ. Stat. arts. 550, 557; March v. Huyler, 50 Tex. 243; Rawle, Covenants for Title, 411; Tiedeman, Real Prop. 729; Bigelow, Estoppel, 387-389; 2 Herman, Estoppel, p. 742, par. 607; Jackson v. Wright, 14 Johns. 193; Jackson v. Hubble, 1 Cow. 616; Smiley v. Fries, 104 Ill. 420; Clark v. Baker, 14 Cal. 612, 76 Am. Dec. 449, and authorities cited; Van-Rensselaer v. Kearney, 52 U. S. 11 How. 297, 13 L. ed. 703; French v. Spencer, 82 U. S. 21 How. 928, 16 L. ed. 97.

If Amos Morrill knew, or under all the circumstances ought to have known, that Lillias Wadkins only owned an undivided one-half interest in the land she assumed to convey, then Lillias Wadkins and those claiming under her would not be estopped from claiming the after-acquired title.

Bigelow, Estoppel, 4th ed. 608; 2 Devlin, Deeds, 1000; Campbell v. Roach, 45 Ala. 667.

Where an interest passes by a deed no estoppel arises.

Tiedeman, Real Prop. 728, and authorities cited; Herman, Estoppel, 25, and authorities cited; House v. McCormick, 57 N. Y. 310.

A valid deed of a married woman estops her only from denying it to be a conveyance; she is not, unless she can contract independently, estopped by her covenants therein, and is not estopped from setting up an after-acquired title.

14 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, pp. 639, 640,

And she is also thus liable in Illinois since the Act of 1874, and N. Y. Act 1882, Laws 62, p. 343, chap. 172, makes covenants in deeds obligatory on married women.

Indiana 1 Gavin & Hord Stat. 258, provided that a joint deed shall pass her lands but not bind her to any covenant therein.

And Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 5117, provides that a married woman may be bound by an estoppel like any other person.

Estoppel by recital.

It seems that a married woman is not estopped as against a fraudulent purchaser, by recitals in her deed stating that it was made with full knowledge of her rights, and under the advice of able counsel. Hickman v. Stewart, 60 Tex. 255.

Or by recitals in a mortgage that advances had been made, where authority had been conferred on her to mortgage her estate for certain advances. Patterson v. Fraser, 5 La. Ann. 583.

And is not estopped by recitals in a deed of trust from showing that the consideration was a debt of her husband and not her own. Bank of America v. Banks, 101 U. S. 240, 25 L. ed. 860.

But in Jones v. Frost, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 773, 43 L. J. Ch. 47, 27 L. T. N. S. 485, 20 Week. Rep. 1025, it was stated that the recital in a deed by a married woman, that her father was dead and that she conveyed all interest coming through him, would bind her as if she was a feme sole, but this was not the question decided in that case.

Estoppel by covenant from acquiring superior title.

There is some conflict of authority as to the estoppel of a married woman in a covenant of warranty, some cases holding that a wife uniting with a husband in a warranty deed of his land is not estopped from acquiring a superior outstanding title. O'Neil v. Vanderburg, 25 Iowa, 104; Childs v.

under the head of Estoppels by deed; Preston v. Evans, 56 Md. 476; Den v. Demarest, 1 N. J. L. 525; Jackson v. Vanderheyden, 17 Johns. 167, 8 Am. Dec. 878; Wight v. Shaw, 5 Cush. 66, 67.

The deed of a married woman to her separate property will not estop her or those claiming under her from claiming an after-acquired title unless the deed contains covenants of warranty.

2 Herman, Estoppel, p. 715, par. 582.

A married woman or those claiming under her cannot be estopped from claiming her separate property which has not been conveyed in the mode pointed out by the statute except where she has been guilty of actual (intentional) fraud.

Berry v. Donley, 26 Tex. 798; Fitzgerald v. Turner, 48 Tex. 82; Johnson v. Bryan, 62 Tex. 623; Steed v. Petty, 65 Tex. 490; Bigelow, Estoppel, 580.

Mr. E. C. McLean, for appellee:

When a married woman joined by her husband executes and delivers a deed to her separate real estate, in which she conveys the land itself as distinguished from conveying her interest in the land for a valuable consideration, and she and her husband acknowledge the same with all the formalities of law, such a deed will convey any title afterwards acquired by inheritance to the same land, whether said deed contains a covenant of warranty or not; and she and her heirs are estopped from setting up such after-acquired title against her grantee and those claiming under such grantee.

Sheffield*, 38 Miss. 359, 77 Am. Dec. 648; Sanford v. Kane, 8 L. R. A. 724, 133 Ill. 199, aff'g 24 Ill. App. 604.

In this last case she joined in the warranty solely to pass her dower.

And a covenant made in New Jersey by a married woman in a deed of her husband's property in New Jersey will not estop her from taking and assigning a prior mortgage. Wilson v. King, 23 N. J. Eq. 150.

Under the New Jersey Act of 1857, she may now bind herself by covenants in a deed.

And a purchase-money mortgage, made by the husband and wife of his property, will not estop her from acquiring a superior title, when the purchase-money mortgage was without consideration, the title having failed. Gonzales v. Hukil, 49 Ala. 261, 20 Am. Rep. 232.

And a mortgage made by the husband and wife to a third party, and afterwards assigned to her, is a prior lien over a subsequent mortgage made by the husband and wife, when such mortgagee had notice, although the first mortgagee had given an agreement to allow any subsequent mortgage priority, of which agreement the wife had no actual knowledge and believed she was only releasing her dower in the second mortgage. Gillig v. Maass, 23 N. Y. 191.

And is not estopped, by the covenants of a mortgage made by her husband and herself on his property to secure his separate debt, from asserting a claim of title accruing to her from a different source. So in the foreclosure of a senior mortgage on her lots including land of her husband for his debt, she is entitled to have his land sold first notwithstanding she may have executed with her hus-

A covenant of warranty is not necessary to estop the grantor and his heirs from setting up an after-acquired title against the grantee and his privies.

Doe v. Oliver, supra.

Under our statutes a married woman can as effectually convey her separate estate, when joined by her husband and acknowledging the instrument with all the formalities of law, as she could as a feme sole.

Rev. Stat. art. 559.

The fact that she was a married woman at the date of the deed does not, therefore, prevent her from being estopped.

Stayton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Mrs. Lillias Wadkins, joined by her husband, executed, with all the formalities necessary to the conveyance of her separate estate, a deed, the material parts of which are as follows: "Know all men by these presents that we, Andrew Jackson Wadkins and Lillias Wadkins, wife of said Andrew Jackson Wadkins, and also heir at law and daughter of William Stoneham, deceased, and his wife, Eliza Stoneham, for and in consideration of two hundred and fifty dollars paid us by Amos Morrill, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, have granted, bargained, sold, and released, and by these presents do grant, bargain, sell, and release unto the said Amos Morrill a certain tract or parcel of land situated in Grayson county, Texas, patented to Robert Nall [here follows a complete and particular description of the entire tract of land, the title to one half of which is in controversy, by metes and bounds], containing eleven hundred and thirty-six and one half acres of land, to have and to hold the said land, together with all and singular the appurtenances, rights, interests, and hereditaments to the same belonging or in any wise incident or appertaining, unto said Amos Morrill, his heirs and assigns, forever." This deed was signed by Lillias and her husband, both making their marks. On this deed the court of civil appeals certifies the following questions: (1) "Where a married woman owned as her separate estate an undivided one-half interest in a tract of land (her brother owning the other half), and such married woman, joined by her husband, conveyed the whole estate by band a junior mortgage on his land. Trentman v. Eldridge, 98 Ind. 525.

So a married woman not personally bound by the covenants in a mortgage made by her husband and herself is not estopped from claiming the title to a lot obtained in exchange for a part of the mortgaged premises, and put in her name before the mortgage is recorded, although the mortgage is prior in date. Reeves v. Howes, 104 Ind. 435.

It is not expressly stated whether she did or did not join in the covenants.

But it was held in King v. Rea, 56 Ind. 1, that under the statute enabling a wife to pass the lands which she holds in her own right, by joining with her husband in the conveyance which purports to convey the entire estate therein, she is estopped from afterwards setting up any title to the land whether it existed at the time of the conveyance or was subsequently acquired.

This decision is criticised in the main case and claimed to have been overruled in Snoddy v. Leavitt, 105 Ind. 367, which holds that a wife joining her husband in a warranty deed of his land, at a time when she was not liable on a covenant of warranty, only releases her inchoate right and is not estopped from acquiring title subsequently in her own right.

This case refers to King v. Rea, supra, and says the difference is here she only conveyed her inchoate right, but questions Scranton v. Stewart, 53 Ind. 68, which intimated that she might be estopped by deed.

And Yost v. Hayes, 90 Ind. 412, holds that where a husband and wife conveyed with covenant of warranty his land after it had been sold under execution, their vendee took her inchoate interest of one third which under Indiana statutes accrued at the expiration of the time for redemption under the sale.

And it was stated in Mamie v. Sebastian, 4 Bibb, 22 L. R. A.

438, that a husband and wife after their warranty deed of his land would not be permitted to claim in opposition to their deed.

And it is also held in some cases that a married woman, in the absence of statutory provisions, is not estopped by her covenants in a deed or mortgage on her property, from subsequently acquiring a superior title to the same property. Carpenter v. Schermerhorn, 2 Barb. Ch. 314, 5 L. ed. 656; Dominick v. Michael, 4 Sandf. 374; Teal v. Woodworth, 8 Paire, 470, 3 L. ed. 535; Den v. Demarest, 21 N. J. L. 525; Preston v. Evans, 56 Md. 476.

There is some conflict on this question and some states have taken a different view, holding that she is estopped in such a case. Nash v. Spofford, 10 Met. 183, 43 Am. Dec. 425; Hill v. West, 8 Ohio, 222, 31 Am. Dec. 442.

And the same was held in Nelson v. Harwood, 3 Call (Va.) 342, but in that case the husband was seized of an estate in fee tail in right of his wife and sold the same giving bond to have an act passed dooking the entail, and then husband and wife conveyed by warranty, and an act was passed but failed to become a law, by dissolution of the assembly, and another one failed because the governor withdrew from the colony and the decision was influenced largely by this.

In Fletcher v. Coleman, 2 Head, 384, it was stated that a wife joining her husband in a covenant of warranty on her land is only bound by estoppel from acquiring other title, but this was not the question involved.

She is estopped by her covenants from procuring or taking a superior title in her husband's land or her own, where the statute authorizes her to contract as a feme sole. Sandwich Mfg. Co. v. Zellmer, 48 Minn. 408; Graham v. Meek, 1 Or. 325; Yerkes v. Hadley, 2 L. R. A. 363, 5 Dak. 324; Guertin v. Mombleau, 144 Ill. 32.

such a deed as is described above, would an after-acquired title to the other half by inheritance from her brother pass by such a deed to the grantee named therein?" (2) "Would a married woman be estopped by such a deed from asserting her after-acquired title?"

The transaction in question occurred in 1856, and, in order to determine the powers and incapacities of married women, we must look to the common law and to the statutes in force at that time. Under the common law, women under coverture had not capacity to convey their lands by deed, or to make other contracts. Since the Act of January 20, 1840, the common law, so far as not inconsistent with the several constitutions and statutes of this state, has been in force. Paschal, Dig. art. 978; Rev. Stat. art. 3128.

And under Mass. Gen. Stat., chap. 108, § 3, providing that a married woman may contract or convey if she has the assent of her husband or the approval of a judge of the court, she is estopped from acquiring a superior title, after a mortgage made by herself and husband with warranty on her property. Knight v. Thayer, 125 Mass. 26.

And Sellers v. Crossan (Kan.) Nov. 11, 1893, holds that a joint deed of the homestead estops her, even if they remain in possession, from asserting title against the mortgagee of the vendee. Although this decision is based on acts in pais, in assisting the vendee to procure the mortgage, yet in that state she may contract as feme sole.

But she is not bound, unless she complies with a statute, which provides that she shall not be bound unless the covenant expressly so states on its face. Thompson v. Merrill, 58 Iowa, 419.

Or where the statute says she shall not be bound. Goodenough v. Fellows, 53 Vt. 102.

Conveyances without covenant by wife.

A married woman joining in her husband's deed releasing her dower, and not joining in the grant, where the land is owned by husband and wife, may assert her title after his death. Wales v. Coffin, 13 Allen, 216.

So in a deed of the wife's land where she joined to pass her "dower right" she is not estopped from claiming the land. Raymond v. Holden, 2 Cush. 264; Pierce v. Chace, 108 Mass. 364.

So where the husband conveys her land, and she signs in token of relinquishment of all her right in the bargained premises she is not estopped from right of entry at his death. Bruce v. Wood, 1 Met. 542, 35 Am. Dec. 380.

But signing and acknowledging a deed of itself where the husband and wife are not named in the body thereof is not an estoppel. Hall v. Ditto, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 667.

So signing a mortgage made by husband is no release of dower. Lufkin v. Curtis, 13 Mass. 223.

And it has been held that a wife joining a husband in the covenants in a deed will not release her dower. Davis v. Bartholomew, 3 Ind. 485.

And she is not estopped from afterwards acquiring title where she united in the deed of his land and the warranty was expressly made by the husband. Tyler v. Moore (Pa.) March 25, 1889; Van-Amburgh v. Kramer, 16 Hun, 305.

Or where he "granted" and she did not unite in that covenant, she is not liable thereon. Dun v. Dietrich (N. Dak.) June 18, 1892.

And a deed of husband and wife of his or her present interest in land will not estop her from asserting title to the same land acquired thereafter. Wight v. Shaw, 5 Cush. 56; Nicholson v. Carress, 45 Ind. 479; Shumaker v. Johnson, 35 Ind. 33.

There are but few statutes bearing on the question of capacity or incapacity of married women to contract, and they will be briefly noticed. Under the Act of March 18, 1848, married women were empowered to contract debts for necessities furnished to themselves or children, and for the benefit of their separate property. Paschal, Dig. art. 4643. That statute, changed somewhat in phraseology, was carried into the Revised Statutes (article 2854). These statutes, however, have application only to the power of married women to contract debts, and this is carefully restricted to the purposes enumerated, and can have no bearing on the questions under consideration, further than that they show the unwillingness of the legislature since their enactment further to remove incapacities of women under coverture to con-

And the same is true under a conveyance of her "right, title, and interest in the estate of her father, deceased." McInnis v. Pickett, 55 Miss. 354. These cases support the doctrine in the main case.

And a mortgage made by wife and husband of land held in trust for her not containing any covenant of title or representation that she owned the fee will not estop her from showing what estate she had in the land. Douglas v. Cruger, 80 N. Y. 15.

Operation and effect of conveyances.

A married woman joining her husband in a conveyance of his land is estopped from afterwards claiming that the land belongs to her, and that the title did not pass by such conveyance. Jones v. Reese, 65 Ala. 134; Fogg v. Yeatman, 6 Lea, 575; Littell v. Hoagland, 106 Ind. 320; Krauth v. Thiele, 45 N. J. Eq. 407.

And is estopped from claiming dower in surplus of sale of husband's land on a prior mortgage where she had joined him in a deed before the sale. Elmendorf v. Lookwood, 57 N. Y. 322.

And a joint mortgage by husband and wife of husband's land operates as a release of dower, but not of her contingent dower in the equity of redemption. Reiff v. Horst, 55 Md. 42.

And a wife's dower is gone except in the equity of redemption where the husband and wife conveyed his land subject to a mortgage made by him and in which she had not joined, and the land was then conveyed back to the husband. Hoogland v. Watt, 2 Sandf. Ch. 143, 7 L. ed. 544.

And in an action for specific performance against husband and wife and their vendee with notice of plaintiff's rights under a title bond on a recovery by plaintiff the wife is estopped from claiming any interest in the land. Farley v. Eller, 20 Ind. 322.

But a mortgage, not for purchase money, made by husband and wife of the wife's statutory estate does not estop her, but passes his estate and his life estate by survivorship. Chapman v. Abrahams, 61 Ala. 115.

And in Hodges v. Powell, 36 N. C. 64, 60 Am. Rep. 401, it was stated that a married woman could not be estopped by contract, but that was not the question involved in the case.

In this note the estoppel of a married woman by deed has been considered only in respect to valid instruments and not with respect to the effect of deeds which are void whether by reason of defective execution or otherwise.

The subject of estoppel in pais as affecting married women is also omitted from this note as a subject for separate treatment.

tract debts or incur personal obligations absolute, further than may be necessary for maintenance of themselves and children and the preservation and improvement of their separate property. Recognizing the fact that married women have no power to execute such bonds as the law requires of persons holding certain trust relations to property the legislature has enacted laws which empower them, when appointed executors, administrators, or guardians, to execute such bonds as the law requires of persons holding such positions. The statute provides that charters of private corporations, incorporated for support of any benevolent, charitable, educational, or missionary undertaking, or the support of any literary undertaking, the maintenance of a library, or the promotion of painting, music, or other fine arts, may be subscribed by married women, and that they may become stockholders, officers, and directors thereof, "and that their acts, contracts, and deeds shall be as binding and effective for all purposes of said corporation as if they were males, and the joinder and consent of their husbands, and privy examinations separate and apart from them shall not be required." Sayles' Civ. Stat. art. 568.

There is nothing in any of these statutes evidencing an intention to empower married women to make any contracts whatever except such as statutes expressly or by necessary implication give them power to make, but throughout they recognize the necessity for legislation to authorize them to contract at all. The Act of April 30, 1846, prescribes the acts necessary to be done to convey any estate or interest in lands or other property, the separate estate of married women. Paschal, Dig. art. 1008. That was an enabling act, as was the Act of February 3, 1841, and from its passage until the present time has prescribed the only mode in which married women can convey their separate property in lands. It was enacted, as shown by the language, and as well as by its title, for the purpose of enabling married women to convey their separate property, as well as for the purpose of "defining the mode of conveying property in which the wife has an interest," and not for the purpose of enabling them or of defining a mode by which they might convey, directly or by operation of covenants expressed or to be implied, something which at some future time might become the separate property of women under coverture. The statute, by compliance with its requirements, empowered married women to convey "any estate or interest in any land, slave or slaves or other effects, the separate property of the wife." The use of the words "the separate property of the wife" restricts the operation of the act, and necessarily implies that the relation of the wife to the property must be such, at the time the conveyance is made, as to render it her separate estate; for it is that alone which the statute empowers her thus to convey. The same manner of conveyance was required by the same statute when the purpose was to convey homestead or other exempt property.

If there could be any doubt as to the true construction of the act, so far as considered, this would be removed by that part which declares what the effect of a deed executed in accordance with its requirements shall be. After declaring the acts essential to be done by the husband and wife, and by the officer taking the married woman's acknowledgment, the statute declares that "such deed or conveyance so certified, shall pass all the right, title, and interest which the husband and wife, or either of them, may have in or to the property therein conveyed." May have in or to the property at what time? Certainly at the time the conveyance is made, and not such as they, or either of them, may subsequently acquire. The husband may doubtless be bound by warranties or covenants he may make, but those would have to be expressed when he joins pro forma in the conveyance of property as the separate estate of the wife. It is often not only advantageous, but necessary, for married women to convey their separate property, and for this reason the power is given under safeguards intended for their protection, but it is not necessary that they should give warranties of title or make covenants in deeds in order to sell, whereby personal obligation would be imposed in case of breach, and therefore no such power has been conferred in terms or by necessary implication. "A covenant of warranty is not an essential part of a deed conveying lands. The title will pass just as effectually without it. Therefore, though the wife execute a deed with covenants, she is not bound by them. The estate simply flows from her; no more." 1 Bishop, Married Women, § 608. Under statutes conferring upon married women, as fully as do statutes of this state, power to convey their separate estates, it had been held that such statutes do not confer power on a feme covert to bind herself even by express covenants in a deed, which, if given effect, would operate to prevent her successful assertion of after-acquired title, and that the sole effect of such conveyances is to pass whatever interest she has at the time the conveyance is made. Jackson v. Vanderheyden, 17 Johns. 167, 8 Am. Dec. 378; Wadleigh v. Glines, 6 N. H. 18, 28 Am. Dec. 705; Den v. Demarest, 21 N. J. L. 541; Preston v. Evans, 56 Md. 490; Falmouth Bridge Co. v. Tibbatts, 16 B. Mon. 688; Whitbeck v. Cook, 15 Johns. 490, 8 Am. Dec. 272; Hobbs v. King, 2 Met. (Ky.) 189; Aldridge v. Burlison, 3 Blackf. 201; Barker v. Circle, 60 Mo. 263; Nicholson v. Hemaley, 3 Harr. & McH. 409; Chapman v. Abrahams, 61 Ala. 115; Porter v. Bradley, 7 R. I. 538.

Under statutes of some of the states married women may hold, manage, and convey their separate estates as may femes sole; and in such cases there may be no good reason why deeds made by them should not be given the same effect in every respect as is given to the deed of one in fact feme sole. In Massachusetts this power and the power to make contracts generally is conferred, with perhaps but two exceptions, which withhold power from her to make contracts with her husband, or, without his written consent, to destroy or impair his tenancy by curtesy in her real estate. In states where such laws exist the decisions must necessarily be other than can be made under the laws of this state. A usage appears to have been established in Massachusetts during its early colonial period, and before the enactment of statutes conferring the power, under which it was held to be lawful for married women, joined by their husbands, to convey their lands. This usage, it was said, "has prevailed without interruption beyond the memory of man; and it cannot now be disallowed, without shaking very many of the existing titles to real estate, and it must now be considered the law of the land. If, therefore, the wife will voluntarily join with her husband in executing a conveyance of the land, she is bound by her deed, so far as it operates to pass her estate. . . . To hold her liable on the covenants cannot be necessary to the conveyance nor beneficial to her family, but may be greatly to her prejudice. The usage, therefore, has never extended to make her liable to an action on the covenants in the deed further than they may operate by way of estoppel." Fowler v. Shearer, 7 Mass. 21. In Colcord v. Swan, which was an action for covenant broken, brought upon covenants of warranty contained in a deed made by husband and wife, purporting to convey her land, it was said: "Her executing the deed operates the conveyance of the land; but, although she is estopped by her covenants, she is not answerable in damages for any breach of them." 7 Mass. 291. These cases are frequently cited in support of the proposition that a married woman is estopped by her deed, but in the case of Wight v. Shaw, 5 Cush. 86, they are held in so far to be dicta. It is said in the case last cited that "the cases of Fowler v. Shearer, 7 Mass. 14, and of Colcord v. Swan, 7 Mass. 291, are leading cases upon the subject of conveying the lands of a feme covert and the origin of the New England practice of conveying the wife's land by a deed of husband and wife. Language is used in those cases which might seem to sanction the principle that the wife would be estopped by the covenant of warranty in such a deed from setting up an after-acquired title. Neither of those cases, however, called for any opinion upon that point, and the language is, therefore, mere dicta. The first was an action of covenant broken, and it was held that the wife was not bound by such covenant, and that an action was not maintainable against her. The other case only involved the effect of such conveyance by husband and wife of her land. The court have uniformly repudiated any liability of the wife on her covenants, and this would seem materially to affect her liability to the bar of estoppel which is supposed to result therefrom. The nature of this estoppel, and the foundation of it, were distinctly stated in the case of Comstock v. Smith, 18 Pick. 117, 28 Am. Dec. 670. The prior case of Nash v. Spofford, 10 Met. 193, 43 Am. Dec. 425, was not noticed in the opinion, but the cases are not in conflict when the fact is considered that the property involved in the case last named was held by a trustee for the sole and separate use of the wife. As to such equitable separate estates, a different rule prevails; the power of the wife in such cases being such as the instrument creating the estate confers upon the wife. The opinion in Wight v. Shaw, however, did cite with approval the case of Jackson v. Vanderheyden, 17 Johns. 167, 8 Am. Dec. 378, upon the proposition that a covenant of warranty does not estop the wife from asserting an after-acquired title. The opinion in Comstock v. Smith so clearly states what is believed to be the true ground on which one who has conveyed land with covenant of warranty or other like covenant cannot set up after-acquired title that an extract from it will be inserted: "Such new title will inure by way of estoppel to the use and benefit of his grantee, his heirs and assigns. This principle is founded in equity and justice, as well as the policy of the law. It is just that a party should not be permitted to hold or recover an estate in violation of his own covenant; and it is wise policy to repress litigation, and to prevent a circuitry of actions, when better or equal justice may be administered in a single suit. By such a grant with general warranty nothing passes, nor, indeed, can possibly pass, excepting the title which the grantor has at the time of the grant; but he is estopped to set up a title subsequently obtained by him, because, if he should recover against his grantee, the grantee in his turn would be entitled to an action against the grantor to recover the value of the land. The principle of estoppel, therefore, not only prevents multiplicity of suits, but is sure to administer strict and exact justice; whereas, if the grantee were driven to his action to recover the value of the land, exact justice might not be obtained, because the land might possibly not be estimated at its just value. If, however, the grantee were not entitled to recover the value of the land on the grantor's covenant of warranty, then, in such a case, it is obvious that this species of estoppel would not be applicable."

The laws of the state of Ohio permitting and regulating the conveyance of lands belonging to married women being practically the same as the laws in force in this state upon that subject in the case of Hill v. West, 8 Ohio, 225, 31 Am. Dec. 442, it was held that a married woman making a conveyance of lands in accordance with the law could not bind herself by contract further than this was expressly authorized by the statute, and that she could not, through a covenant of warranty, render herself liable in damages for its breach; but in that case it was held that such a covenant would estop her from asserting after-acquired title, and that to this end liability to damages for breach of covenant was not necessary. The Massachusetts cases before referred to are cited as authority for these propositions.

The laws in force in Indiana empowering married women to convey lands belonging to them, and prescribing the mode in which that might be done, at the time the facts accrued on which the decision in King v. Rea, 56 Ind. 17, was made, are understood to have been practically the same as the laws in force in this state upon that subject. A married woman and her two children owned as tenants in common a tract of land, and she, in the manner prescribed by the statute, made a deed, in which her husband joined, that purported to convey the entire interest in the land with warranty of title. Subsequently one of her children died, and she was one of the heirs, and the question was whether she was estopped from asserting title thus acquired, and it was held that, "where a married woman joins with her husband in a conveyance of lands held in her own right, which purports to convey the entire estate therein, she is estopped from afterwards setting up any title to the lands so conveyed, whether it existed at the time of making the conveyance or was subsequently acquired. It was conceded that she was not barred by her warranty, but it was held that she was estopped by her deed. It was said that "the statute which enables her thus to convey, during coverture, the lands held in her own right, imposes upon her as a corollary all the obligations of the conveyance, save those which the statute itself excepts; for it would be an absurdity to say that she had passed her lands if she could take them back again; and the estoppel does not depend upon the obligation of the covenant of warranty." In so far as the wife had an estate in the land, that passed by the deed executed in the manner prescribed, and no question of estoppel arose as to that; but the theory upon which it seems to have been held that the after-acquired title passed by estoppel appears unsound if the common law was in force in that state, for the wife's disabilities under such circumstances would be those prescribed by the common law, except as they may have been removed by statute. The power would not be that of a feme sole unless made so by statute, and her obligation would necessarily be measured by her power to bind herself, and the extent to which she had used that. If the wife has no power to convey an estate she assumes to convey, it must be true, no fraud intervening, that her act cannot be made the basis of estoppel; for otherwise she would be able to accomplish indirectly that which the law declares she shall not do nor have power to do. The opinion in King v. Rea, was qualified, if not overruled, in Snoddy v. Leavitt, 105 Ind. 859. In the opinion in that case it was said that the estoppel referred to in the purchase was in pais; but there was no fact shown to make such estoppel, unless it be that the execution of a deed by a married woman, purporting to convey a tract of land, when she only owned an undivided interest in it, was of itself such fraud as would create an estoppel. Such a holding could not have been intended in the last case, for in that case it was held that a wife who joined a husband in the execution of a warranty deed conveying his land, at a time when she was not liable upon covenants of warranty, was not estopped from asserting title to the same land, subsequently acquired by her.

Under the ruling in Lindsay v. Freeman, 88 Tex. 259, covenants may be implied which will operate to preclude a person sui juris, making such a deed, and the heirs of such person, from asserting after-acquired title; but the rule announced in that case can have no application in this, and it is now unnecessary to consider whether estoppel arising in such cases is by deed or in pais. If a married woman is not bound by express warranty of title, she cannot be bound by any implied covenant; and it is unnecessary to inquire how far she may be bound by express covenants or recitals in deeds of a nature such, if untrue, as to mislead, and therefore fraudulent.

While there is no decision in this state bearing directly on the questions certified, the general principles which must control it have been declared. Kavanaugh v. Brown, 1 Tex. 483; Trimble v. Miller, 24 Tex. 215.

The deed in question did not pass the after-acquired title, nor did it estop Mrs. Wadkins or her heirs.

Brown, J., did not sit in this case.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

KIRKPATRICK & CO., Appts.,

v.

W. P. PURYEAR.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. The indorsement of the check of another to a creditor in settlement of notes and an account, accompanied by a surrender of the notes and a receipt in full of the account, will be regarded as payment, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary.

2. The indorser of a check is released by failure, for several days, to present it at a bank in the same place during which the bank fails and the collection of the check is rendered im-

NOTE.—Release of indorser of check by delay in presenting it.

Unreasonable delay.

The indorser of a check is released if the holder does not present the same for payment in a reasonable time, even if there were no funds to meet the check.

So retaining a check seven days before mailing is unreasonable delay. Northwestern Coal Co. v. Bowman, 89 Iowa, 150.

And the same was held where the check was sent by a route requiring five days, when the bank was only twenty-seven miles distant and there were two daily mails between these points. First Nat. Bank of Wymore v. Miller (Neb.) 48 Alb. L. J. 265, 87 Cent. L. J. 276.

So where the delay was six days, and the bank was in the same city, the indorser was released, — Gough v. Staats, 18 Wend. 549; or nine days, — Carroll v. Sweet, 13 L. R. A. 43, 128 N. Y. 19.

So where a check would have been paid if presented, and it was held from February 1, to March possible, when there was a deposit out of which it would have been paid if promptly presented.

3. The holder of a check has the burden of proving that the indorser was not injured by delay in presenting it until after the bank had failed, where the indorser has proved that it was not duly presented for payment; and this is the rule whether the suit is brought on the check or on an indebtedness, to pay which the check was transferred and indorsed.
4. The extinguishment of the liability of an indorser of a check by failure to present it until after the bank has failed extinguishes his liability also on an indebtedness for payment of which the check was indorsed.

28, and no good reason showed for the delay. Miller v. Moseley, 26 La. Ann. 607.

And the same was held where a bank retained a post-dated check twenty-three days after date, before presenting the same at a bank sixteen miles distant. Mohawk Bank v. Broderick, 10 Wend. 304, 13 Wend. 133, 27 Am. Dec. 133.

And the indorser was released where a check was held six days, and would have been paid if promptly presented. Merchants Nat. Bank of Poughkeepsie v. Parker, 12 N. Y. S. R. 553.

And the failure for three days to present a check at the same place where held will release the indorser in an action for the debt, for which it was transferred, if the check would have been paid on presentment. It was also stated that he was released on his indorsement. Betterton v. Roope, 3 Lea, 215.

And where the delay was three days in the same city, the court held that the indorser as such was discharged, but that where the drawers had failed before the receipt of check by the indorsee, as the indorser was not prejudiced, he was still liable for the debt, which the check had been transferred to pay, as a worthless check would not pay the debt. Fleig v. Sleet, 43 Ohio St. 53, 54 Am. Rep. 300.

Where an indorsee held a check two days, and his indorser held it ten days, and then it took eight days more to reach New York where it was payable, when it could have reached there in five days, a prior indorser was discharged. Parker v. Reddick, 65 Miss. 242. As to whether it would have been paid if presented in time does not appear.

So where it does not appear whether there were funds or not, a delay of three days in presentment at the same place releases the indorser. Westminster Bank v. Wheaton, 4 R. L. 30; Veazie Bank v. Winn, 40 Me. 60.

And the same was held where a post-dated check falling due on Sunday was presented on the Saturday before but was not presented thereafter. Salter v. Burt, 20 Wend. 205, 32 Am. Dec. 530.

And in Schofield v. Moon, 9 Heak. 173, it was stated that the holder must present a check in a reasonable time, or the indorser will be released, but this was not the question involved.

These cases showing that want of diligence on the part of the holder will release the indorser support the main case.

Reasonable delay.

The indorser of a check will not be released if it is presented in a reasonable time. As to what is a reasonable time will depend on the circumstances of each case, and a presentment of a check on the day after it is drawn or received has been held to be sufficient diligence. Shrieve v. Duckham, 1 Litt. (Ky.) 194; Rickford v. Ridge, 2 Campb. 537; Merchants Bank v. Spicer, 6 Wend. 443.

And the same was held where an earlier presentment would have been useless. Weddigen v. Boston Elastic Fabric Co. 100 Mass. 423.

APPEAL by complainants from a judgment of the Chancery Court for Davidson County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due upon an account. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Smith & Dickinson, for appellants:

A check of a third person given and accepted in payment of a demand, and by both parties supposed to be good, but proving worthless, is not payment.

Briggs v. Holmes, 118 Pa. 233; Holmes v. Briggs, 131 Pa. 233; Fleig v. Sleet, 43

ment would have been useless. Weddigen v. Boston Elastic Fabric Co. 100 Mass. 423.

So an indorser is liable who held a check ten days and his indorsee presented it the next day, when the bank failed the day of the last indorsement. Small v. Franklin Min. Co. 99 Mass. 377.

And there is no release of an indorser of a post-dated check intended to be circulated, indorsed in New York city to a resident of Pennsylvania and by him taken to his place of residence and promptly transmitted from that place, reaching Middletown, New York, seventy-three miles from New York, where it was discounted, three days after due, although the drawer's funds had disappeared. Middletown Bank v. Morris, 28 Barb. 616.

And a payee indorsing in New York city a check dated the 17th, on Buffalo, New York, that is received by the indorsee on the 28th, and presented August 4th, when the mail required three days to transmit from New York to Buffalo, must explain the delay between the 17th and 28th. The delay thereafter is not unreasonable. Smith v. Jones, 3 Wend. 132, 32 Am. Dec. 537.

In Foster v. Paulk, 41 Me. 425, in a suit against a drawer, it was stated that an indorser would be liable if payment was refused by the drawee on proper legal demand.

And a certification of check before indorsement will not release the indorser if the holder uses diligence. Mutual Nat. Bank v. Rotgé, 23 La. Ann. 933, 26 Am. Rep. 123. In this case the check was presented the next day.

And an indorser who admitted the check had been dishonored and promised to take it up is liable, although the time of presentment did not appear, as this admission is presumptive evidence that a proper demand had been made. Tebbetts v. Dowd, 23 Wend. 379.

And an indorser is not released by delay in presentment of check if he knew that the drawer had no funds and that the check would not be paid. It would be otherwise if he believed that the check would be paid. Humphries v. Ricknell, 2 Litt. (Ky.) 238, 13 Am. Dec. 238.

But where a check payable to bearer and undorsed was transferred by a debtor, and there were no funds to meet the check, and it was held twenty-six days and the bank suspended, the holder may sue on the original debt, although the banker testified that the check would have been paid if it had been presented promptly. Morris v. Kennedy, 2 Kan. 403, 33 Am. Rep. 169.

This is similar to Fleig v. Sleet, 43 Ohio St. 53, 54 Am. Rep. 300, and both differ from the main case, as in the latter case there was a fund to meet the check.

And an indorser is liable on assumption on a check which had been held a year without demand and there were no funds when presented, where the indorser "waived demand and notice." Emery v. Hobson, 62 Me. 573, 16 Am. Rep. 513.

A check is a mere request to pay the bearer or the order of the payee. Until presented and accepted, it is inchoate and vests no title or interest in the payee to the fund.

Imboden v. Perrie, 18 Lea, 504.

Taking a note for goods sold is a payment, because it is a part of the original contract; but paper is no payment when there is a precedent debt.

Andrews v. German Nat. Bank, 9 Heisk. 211, 24 Am. Rep. 800.

The presumption is that a check is not an absolute payment, but it is competent for the parties to contract that it should be an absolute payment.

Co. v. Collins*, 3 Lans. 29.

Where a check is transferred in settlement of a debt, the implication of law is that it is not to constitute an absolute discharge of the debt, until the check is presented by the creditor and paid, or certified on such presentment.

Messrs. Stokes & Stokes, for appellee:

As to whether a check is given and taken as payment of a debt is a question of fact to be determined by the actions, conduct, and language of the parties at the time of the transaction.

Springfield v. Green, 7 Baxt. 301.

When this new security was given and the old one surrendered under the doctrine of "novation" the original debt was extinguished and complainants must look to the check and the parties to it for payment.

It is the duty of the holder of a check, if he receives it after banking hours, to present it during banking hours of the next day, if the bank is located in the same town; if not, then to forward it next day by mail. If he fails to do this and the check afterwards is not paid, his right as against the indorser is extinguished, both as to the check and the original indebtedness.

Planters Bank v. Merritt, 7 Heisk. 193; Schoolfield v. Moon, 9 Heisk. 173.

The question here is between the holder and the indorser of the check. In such a case it is the failure to present the check on the next day that extinguishes the indorser's liability, and not whether the indorser was damaged by the delay.

Carroll v. Sweet, 18 L. R. A. 48, 128 N. Y. 19.

If in the case of indorser the question of damages could be looked to, the law casts the burden of proving that there was no damage upon the complainants, and not upon defendant to show that he was damaged.

Even as against the makers of the check the law requires the holder to make such proof, and consequently there would be still greater reason for the enforcement of such law where the rights of an indorser are involved.

Planters Bank v. Merritt, 7 Heisk. 193; Smith v. Miller, 43 N. Y. 171, 3 Am. Rep. 690; 3 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 218; Little v. Phenix Bank, 2 Hill, 425; Stevens v. Park, 73 Ill. 887; Ford v. McClung, 5 W. Va. 166.

Mr. Morse says: "The burden of proof on the holder to show that the drawer was not injured by delay is shifted, if it is shown that the drawer withdrew the funds or that the drawee was insolvent at the time of presentment."

Banks & Banking, § 421, subsec. "f."

If the payee of the check receive it on Monday and deposit it in his bank, presentment must still be made, in the same place, or the check forwarded to any other place where the drawee bank is, by the payee's bank (as by himself) during banking hours Tuesday.

Id. § 421.

Snodgrass, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit is brought by bill in chancery on an account for $745, alleged to be due from defendant. The defense was by answer averring payment, and exhibiting the receipt in full of the account sued on. The defendant further set up in defense that the payment was made by a check drawn in his favor by Sulzbacher Bros., and indorsed to the complainant. It was insisted that this check, which was indorsed on the 19th of June, 1891, had been accepted in payment of the account, but that, if only taken as a means of payment, the check was not presented until the 22d of June, and until after the failure of the bank on which it was drawn,—the Nashville Savings Bank; and that the negligence of the complainant in the presentment of the check had occasioned the loss, and that defendant was thereby discharged from liability on the original account. It was shown in proof that the account, which was for a little more than $1,100, was made up, among other things, of two notes aggregating about $1,000. These notes, not due, had been charged into the account by direction of defendant's agent, and for the aggregate of something over $1,100 a receipt in full had been taken, and these notes delivered up in connection with that receipt. Other proof was taken, and the case heard by the chancellor, who dismissed the bill, and complainant appealed, and assigned errors.

The first question to be determined is whether the indorsement of the check was done in payment of the indebtedness. The settlement of that question depends upon the intent of the parties as evidenced by express agreement or the facts and circumstances of the transaction. The evidence on this subject is as follows: The member of the firm of Kirkpatrick & Co., with whom the transaction was had, was asked: "Please state whether or not you took the checks as in themselves a payment [there were other checks indorsed with this, not necessary to be noticed] for the amount of the account, or how you took them. A. I supposed that the bank drafts and the Sulzbacher check were good, and took them expecting they would be paid, and the money so realized would go in payment of Puryear's account and the cash I had advanced. I did not take them as a payment of the account, but only as a way of paying it, and for Puryear's convenience. If the checks were not paid, I, of course, did not expect the account would thereby be paid." It is observed that he does not state what was said between them, nor deny what Puryear's son and agent (to be subsequently shown) testifies as to what was said. At most it is but the expression of his present view of the condition of his mind at the time of the transaction. The son and agent of Puryear testifies, on being asked: "What did you say to him when you gave him the check, relative to its being a payment on your father's account?" "I did not say anything, except told him that I wanted to pay the account in full as to the amount of it, and gave him the Sulzbacher check in part payment of it." "Did Kirkpatrick & Co. raise any objection to taking the Sulzbacher check, or what did they say, if anything, about it?" "No, sir; they did not make any objection, but remarked that this was good for it." This, with the delivery up of the notes and the receipting of the account in full, constitute the facts of the transaction as developed in the evidence. It will be remembered that this is not the case of Puryear giving his own check for his own account, and the law relating to that condition of facts need not be discussed. It is the case of the indorsement of a check of another to a creditor in settlement of the account, whether it be payment absolute or conditional, and to be governed by the law as to such transfer. It is well settled that the taking of the creditor's check on account is not payment unless it was so intended (Springfield v. Green, 7 Baxt. 801), and it is true that the taking of a check of another by a creditor on account is not necessarily payment, but must have effect according to the intention of the parties. In the absence of proof of a special agreement, the giving up or retention of the original security will, in general, be a decisive circumstance in determining that question, for if the creditor means, in any contingency, to resort to the original indebtedness, he will scarcely be willing to surrender all evidence of that indebtedness to his debtor without fortifying himself with some evidence of the real nature of the transaction. Morris v. Harvey, 75 Va. 726; Fidelity Ins. Trust & S. D. Co. v. Shenandoah Valley R. Co. 86 Va. 1.

Upon the facts of this transaction, as given by the son and not denied by the complainant, we are of the opinion that the check was accepted in payment. In this connection it is objected that the pleadings raised no question as to notes delivered up with the receipt when the account was received, but receipt for the account is exhibited with the answer, and the account itself is proven by exhibit to deposition of defendant's witness before quoted on another point, and it shows that it was largely made up of the notes charged in it, and the answer avers that the check was delivered in payment of this account, and the proof so shows. Where the creditor accepts the check of his debtor, it is his duty to make presentment and demand, and, of course, the same duty devolves upon him in the acceptance of an indorsed check, which is additional security. This check was not, in fact, presented until June 22,—after the failure of the bank. Defendant averred in answer that Sulzbacher Bros. had on deposit at the time the check was drawn, and up to the failure of the bank, an amount sufficient to have paid the check, and this amount was lost to him by the negligence of the complainant. It is not denied that if these facts be true (and the failure to make demand is proven, though no proof is offered as to the condition of Sulzbacher's account, as averred) the defendant would be discharged, and without proof of the last one he would be discharged if this was a suit upon the check; but it is insisted that, being a suit upon the original account, the burden of proof is not only on the defendant to show that presentment and demand were not made by the plaintiff, but that Sulzbacher Bros. had the amount of money on deposit to pay it, and that defendant sustained the loss of that amount by reason of such negligence in presenting the check. It is the duty of the holder of a check, if he receives it after banking hours, to present it during banking hours of the next day, if the bank is located in the same town, as was this one; if not, then to forward it next day by mail. If he fails to do this, and the check is afterwards not paid, his right, as against the indorser, is extinguished. Morse, Banks & Banking, § 423; Planters Bank v. Merritt, 7 Heisk. 193; Schoolfield v. Moon, 9 Heisk. 173.

It is argued, however, that though the indorser's liability as such is extinguished, yet if the indorser is the original debtor his liability on the original indebtedness is not extinguished, unless it further appears that actual loss was sustained in consequence of such delay; and that the burden of proof is on the debtor to go further, and show such loss.

This exact question in express terms has not been adjudicated in this state, and there is a great dearth of authority upon it, although it would seem to be one which must have repeatedly arisen. It is settled in this state and many others that in suits on checks, where there has not been due demand and notice, the burden of proof is upon the holder of the check to show that the drawer has sustained no injury. 3 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, and cases cited under the note as to burden of proof. See Planters Bank v. Merritt, 7 Heisk. 177. The same doctrine has been applied in this state to the case of suit on the original indebtedness. Betterton v. Roope, 3 Lea, 215. It is true that in that case it appeared in fact that the drawer had funds to his credit, but this was not the controlling point in the case, and, besides, this was the case of a drawer's check, and not an indorsed one. We think the sound rule is, whether the suit be on the check indorsed or on the original indebtedness, and it appears in the proof that such check was not duly presented and payment demanded, where the check has been received as absolute or conditional payment, then the burden of proof shifts to the holder to show that, notwithstanding such delay, the debtor was not injured. In the Merritt Case, already cited, it is said if the presentment and demand be not properly made the presumption of injury from the negligence of the holder arises, and the onus of showing that no injury has resulted from delay to the drawer rests on the holder. The presumption is that the check is drawn on actual funds.

It is insisted in the argument of complainant that a different rule is settled in the cases of Bradford v. Fox, 38 N. Y. 289, and Syracuse, B. & N. Y. R. Co. v. Collins, 3 Lans. 29; but this is an erroneous application of these cases. The first was the case of the debtor giving his own check in payment, which the bank refused to certify without explanation, thus creating the inference that the check was worthless. It is true that the court in that case said "that cases regarding the laches of the holder in demanding payment or in giving notice of dishonor, in which the onus of proving that no damages accrued was upon the holder, had no application, because this action was for the collection of the pre-existing debt, and the onus of proving payment was upon the defendant; and that it was not sufficient for him to show laches of the plaintiff, but he must go further, and show that loss had occurred." But that was simply applying the rule, which, as we understand it, is applied by courts holding that the burden of proof, in cases where the creditor has given his own check in payment of his indebtedness, is upon the holder to show both delay and loss. Such holding puts the burden upon him, not only to show delay in presentment of the check, but loss to himself in consequence. If, however, payment absolute or conditional has been made by the check of another, indorsed by the debtor, the failure to present such check and demand payment properly, will release the debtor as to his liability upon the check and original indebtedness. Smith v. Miller, 43 N. Y. 171, 8 Am. Rep. 690; Dan. Neg. Inst. § 828, cited and approved; Betterton v. Roope, 3 Lea, 220.

The second case in 8 Lansing's Reports, cited, was also a case where the debtor had given his own check, and in which the rule stated in the Bradford Case was applied; put, too, upon the ground that the action was upon the pre-existing debt, and was not, therefore, concluded by proof of delay in presentment of the check, independent of any proof of loss. They sustain the theory that such delay alone does not discharge the original debt of the drawer. But in the case of Carroll v. Sweet, 128 N. Y. 19, 13 L. R. A. 43, a later case from the same state, and from the court of appeals, where provisional payment of a debt had been made by indorsed check, it was said: "The debt remained until discharged by payment of the check, or by such dealing with the check by the plaintiff as would in judgment of law convert what was originally a provisional payment into an absolute one. The check was dated August 22, 1887, and was drawn on the Asbury Park National Bank, and was on the same day indorsed and delivered by the defendant to the plaintiff at the place where the bank was located. The plaintiff, on accepting the check, assumed, as between himself and the defendant, an obligation to present the same to the bank for payment within the time prescribed by the law-merchant,—that is to say, not later than the next day after its date,—and, if refused, to protest the same, and give notice of nonpayment. Smith v. Jones, 20 Wend. 192, 33 Am. Dec. 527. It was not presented until the 31st of August, nine days after it was received by plaintiff. The defendant was, by such delay, discharged from liability as indorser of the check, irrespective of any question of loss or injury. Presentment in due time, as fixed by the law merchant, was a condition, upon the performance of which the liability of the defendant as indorser depended, and this delay was not excused although the drawer of the check had no funds, or was insolvent, or because presentment would have been unavailing as a means of procuring payment. Mohawk Bank v. Broderick, 10 Wend. 304; Gough v. Staats, 18 Wend. 549. A different rule obtains as between the holder and drawer of a check. As between them, presentment may be made at any time, and delay in presentment does not discharge the liability of the drawer, unless loss to him has resulted. Little v. Phenix Bank, 2 Hill, 425. The action here is not upon the indorsement of the defendant, but upon the original indebtedness. If the discharge of the defendant's liability as indorser discharges also his liability as debtor for the original debt, the judgment must, on that ground, be reversed. In Hamilton v. Cunningham, 2 Brock. 850, Chief Justice Marshall considered the effect of the neglect of the holder of a bill to give due notice of dishonor, whereby prior parties thereto were discharged upon the liability of the debtor for a debt for which the bill was drawn. After showing that the authoritles in which the debtor had been discharged proceeded upon the theory that he has sustained an actual loss, he reached the conclusion that the true principle is 'that, if a bill be received as provisional payment, the omission to give defendant notice of its dishonor deprives the creditor of his action on that bill, but does not compel him to take it in absolute payment, or deprive him of his action on the original debt, further than damage has been sustained actually or in legal supposition by the debtor.' See also, Gallagher v. Roberts, 2 Wash. C. C. 191; Fleig v. Sleet, 48 Ohio St. 58, 54 Am. Rep. 800." Andrews, J., who delivered the opinion in that case, adds: "I am not sure that this doctrine is reconcilable with expressions in the opinion of this court in Smith v. Miller, 48 N. Y. 171, 3 Am. Rep. 690, 52 N. Y. 545." He then quotes from that case, and shows that judgment was therein rendered for the defendant on two grounds: "First, in the absence of proof of demand and refusal and notice to the drawer according to the usual course, there could be no recovery upon the draft, or upon the indebtedness upon which it was given; and, second, on the ground of negligence in failing to present the check on the day on which it was given. The last ground stated was, upon the facts, a satisfactory basis for the judgment, and the same principle was applied upon similar facts in First Nat. Bank of Meadville, Pa. v. Fourth Nat. Bank of New York City, 77 N. Y. 330, 33 Am. Rep. 618." The court then declines to determine whether the cases cited were in conflict or not, or which class of cases stood upon the better reason, but gave the defendant a new trial upon the facts. We think, as therein indicated, that the extinguishment of liability as indorser on the check was an extinguishment of liability for the original indebtedness; that when defendant had shown such delay in the presentment and demand as discharged the indorser, it made out a case in which he was discharged from the original indebtedness, and, if any facts existed which would rebut the case thus made out, the onus shifted to the plaintiff to show them. See, as to shifting of burden of proof on analogous question, Morse, Banks & Banking, § 421, subsec. f.

The judgment is therefore affirmed, with costs.

BRIEG et al., Appts

(.....Cal.....)

1. The words "Sarsaparilla and Iron" cannot be claimed as a trademark for a medicinal compound or beverage including sarsaparilla and iron as ingredients as against an alleged infringing compound of which the words are equally descriptive, even if the ingredients named are only a small part of the compound.

2. The use of labels, marks, and devices so closely resembling those used by one claiming a trademark as to deceive purchasers exercising ordinary care constitutes an infringement of his rights independently of the validity of the trademarks in question.

3. A palpable imitation of a label for a medicinal compound called "Sarsaparilla and Iron" both having the word "sarsaparilla" at the top in large letters and the word "iron" in the border of the lower half of the label, and both having parallel lines across the middle with the names of the manufacturers between and their monogram in the same position, and both having the words "a great blood purifier" and "cures all skin diseases" printed in the lower half of the label while the only material difference in the design and appearance of the labels is in their color, is sufficient to constitute an infringement, even if there is no valid trademark in any of the words copied.

(December 30, 1893.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco in favor of plaintiffs and from an order denying a motion for a new trial in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged infringement of a trademark and to enjoin further infringement. Modified and affirmed.

No one can acquire an exclusive right to any of those words by adopting it as a trademark unless it be used arbitrarily as a fancy name, neither intended to designate qualities or ingredients of the commodity to which it is attached, nor to mislead the public as to the true qualities or ingredients of the commodity.

The unreasonable delay on the part of respondents in asserting any claim of exclusive right in or to the trademark or label, whatever effect it may have under our law upon the right to an injunction, certainly takes away all equitable right to any accounting for damages, or to any awarding of damages beyond that which is merely nominal.

Messrs. John L. Boone and Langhorne & Miller, for respondents:

Respondents do not claim the right to the exclusive use of the word "Sarsaparilla." Neither do they claim the exclusive right to the use of the word "Iron."

What they do claim is that they adopted the words "Sarsaparilla and Iron" as a compound name or phrase, to indicate or designate a new product, and that the use of this name or phrase is foreign to any use to which it had ever before been applied.

The very fact, therefore, that the appellants are selling, under the name "Sarsaparilla and Iron," a beverage that is not respondents' patented beverage, is evidence of fraud on their part. Their beverage is not "Sarsaparilla and Iron," but an imitation of respondents' beverage, and in order to deceive the public and keep up the imitation and fraud they call it "Sarsaparilla and Iron," thus uniting every element that constitutes a fraud, both upon the respondents and upon the public, and carrying on an unfair competition in business.

Paterson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for an injunction, and to recover damages for an infringement of plaintiffs' trademark and labels. The facts found by the court below are substantially as follows: In the year 1887 plaintiffs commenced to manufacture and sell a new and valuable medicinal compound or beverage, and adopted and used in connection with the sale thereof the name "Sarsaparilla and Iron." By reason of the superior character of the medicinal constituents employed in the manufacture of the beverage or compound it became widely known and highly esteemed by the trade, and identified and distinguished by dealers and consumers under the designation of "Sarsaparilla and Iron." This name was not at that time in use or known as a designation of any similar article of manufacture on sale. For the purpose of identifying the beverage as being of their manufacture, and to distinguish it from other articles of a similar nature, plaintiffs have affixed to the bottles containing the same their own labels, devices, and trademark, specimens of which are attached to the complaint herein. The article has become widely known to the public and to buyers and consumers thereof as the beverage manufactured and sold by the plaintiffs, not only through the name "Sarsaparilla and Iron," but through said labels; and up to the time of the infringement, hereinafter referred to, large sales and great profits had been made by the plaintiffs. The defendants, since the month of December, 1888, willfully disregarding the rights of the plaintiffs, and with the intention to divert to themselves the business of the plaintiffs, and the profits and gains thereof, have fraudulently prepared, sold, and now continue to manufacture and sell, throughout the state of California, an article or beverage in imitation of the plaintiffs' beverage, having the same taste, flavor, and appearance as plaintiffs' article, with the intent to deceive and defraud the public and to injure and defraud the plaintiffs. They have put their beverage in bottles and packages similar to those used by the plaintiffs, and have labeled their bottles with labels, names, marks, and devices similar to those used by the plaintiffs. Copies of these labels are attached to the complaint. These marks and devices so closely resembled those used by the plaintiffs as to be calculated and liable to deceive purchasers and consumers of plaintiffs' article, and to lead them, although exercising ordinary care and prudence, to believe that the article contained therein is the plaintiffs' article, greatly to the diminution and damage of the business and profits of plaintiffs derived therefrom. The defendants' beverage in imitation of the plaintiffs' compound or beverage is inferior to that put up by the plaintiffs, and by reason thereof the reputation of plaintiffs' article has been greatly injured, but there is no deleterious or poisonous substance in the defendants' beverage. By reason of the wrongful acts of the defendants the plaintiffs have sustained damage in the amount of $3,539.25. Upon these findings the court concluded that the plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction perpetually restraining the defendants from "preparing, putting up, selling, or offering for sale said or any imitation of plaintiffs' article, or any article under or bearing the name of 'Sarsaparilla and Iron,' or any article under or bearing a colorable or other imitation of said name, or any article bearing said false labels (Exhibit B), or any imitation of the said labels of plaintiffs, or any article bearing upon or connecting therewith any of the said names, devices, or trademarks of the plaintiffs which are shown upon said labels or exhibits. Also that plaintiffs were entitled to recover said sum of $3,539.25 and costs." A decree was entered accordingly.

1. Words which are merely descriptive of the character, quality, or composition of an article cannot be monopolized as a trademark.

Thus it has been held that the words "Iron Bitters" are so far indicative of the qualities of an article as to fall within the scope of the rule (Brown Chemical Co. v. Meyer, 139 U. S. 542, 35 L. ed. 248), and that name is no more generic than the name "Sarsaparilla and Iron." Our Code provides that a trademark shall not include any designation "which relates only to the name, quality, or description of the thing." Civil Code, § 991. Words in common use are the common property of the people, and no one can acquire an exclusive right to such words by adopting them as his trademark, unless they be used out of their ordinary acceptation, and as a fancy name. The general rule is opposed to the use of mere words as a trademark; but if all of the words be used under a new combination in the way of a fancy name or designation, they may constitute a valid trademark, if they do in fact indicate origin or ownership. Lawrence Mfg. Co. v. Tennessee Mfg. Co. 138 U. S. 546, 34 L. ed. 1008. We think the words "Sarsaparilla and Iron" are generic terms, and were used for the purpose of indicating, not so much the origin, manufacture, or ownership of the beverage, as the quality of the article itself. In Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Clark, 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 327, 20 L. ed. 584, the court said: "True, it may be that the use by a second producer, in describing truthfully his product by a name or combination of words already in use by another, may have the effect of causing the public to mistake as to the origin or ownership of the property; but if it is just as true in its application to his goods as it is to those of another, who first applied it, and who, therefore, claims an exclusive right to use it, there is no legal or moral wrong done." We held here that a person is not entitled to the exclusive use of the words "Antiquarian Book Store" as a trademark. Choyne v. Cohen, 89 Cal. 501, 2 Am. Rep. 476. See also Browne, Trademarks, § 164; Raggett v. Findlater, L. R. 17 Eq. 29. The words "Sarsaparilla and Iron" describe ingredients well known to the public. The word "sarsaparilla" means a root, or its extract, and iron, as used in connection with the word "sarsaparilla," must mean a solution of the metal iron. But it is claimed by respondents that the words "Sarsaparilla and Iron" do not, in fact, indicate the character, kind, or quality of their beverage; that it is not a composition of sarsaparilla and iron, but a solution of various substances; that it contains only a small quantity of sarsaparilla and a small quantity of iron and the name was given to the beverage only as a name by which it might be known, without in any way being descriptive. But it is sufficient to say in answer to this claim that the name given to the article is either generic, or it is of such a character that it can as well be applied to defendants' beverage as to the plaintiffs'; and, this being so, as was said in Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Clark, supra, although the use of the name may have the effect of causing the public to mistake as to the origin or ownership of the product, "if it is just as true in its application to his goods as it is to those of another, who first applied to it, . . . there is no legal or moral wrong done," the words or combination being of such a character as to designate respectively well-known articles of commerce.

2. It will be observed from our statement of the facts that the court found the defendants willfully, with intention to divert to themselves the business of the plaintiffs, and secure the profits and gains thereof, prepared and sold large quantities of an inferior imitation of the defendants' beverage, and in doing so had used labels, marks, and devices so closely resembling those used by the plaintiffs as to deceive the purchasers, and lead them, although exercising ordinary care, to believe that they were purchasing plaintiffs' beverage. Upon this finding the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment, independently of the validity of the trademarks in question. In Lawrence Mfg. Co. v. Tennessee Mfg. Co., supra, Mr. Chief Justice Fuller said: "Undoubtedly an inferior and fraudulent competition against the business of the plaintiff, conducted with the intent on the part of the defendant to avail itself of the reputation of the plaintiff to palm off its goods as plaintiff's, would, in a proper case, constitute ground for relief;" and in the course of his opinion referred to an English case, in which Lord Justice Lindley remarked that, "although the plaintiffs had no exclusive right to the use of the words 'Stone Ale' alone as against the world, or any right to prevent the defendant selling his goods as having been made at Stone, yet, as against a particular defendant, who is fraudulently using or going to fraudulently use the words with the express purpose of passing off his goods as the goods of the plaintiffs, it appears to me that the plaintiffs may have rights which they may not have against other traders." A competing business firm is bound to deal fairly in placing its rival article upon the market; and, if it clearly appears that the defendants have closely imitated the plaintiffs' labels and style, and have done obvious damage to the latter's business through the unlawful business methods employed, the plaintiffs are entitled to relief upon the ground of fraud. Sperry v. Percival Milling Co. 81 Cal. 258; Pierce v. Guittard, 68 Cal. 68, 58 Am. Rep. 1. Cases are not wanting of injunctions issued to restrain the use even of one's own name, where such use is made with such additions as to intentionally deceive the public, and make them believe he is selling the goods of another. McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 251, 24 L. ed. 830; Brown Chemical Co. v. Meyer, supra. See also Mozie Nerve Food Co. v. Baumbach, 82 Fed. Rep. 212; California Fig Syrup Co. v. Improved Fig Syrup Co. 51 Fed. Rep. 297; Improved Fig Syrup Co. v. California Fig Syrup Co. 54 Fed. Rep. 178, 7 U. S. App.—; Cleveland Stone Co. v. Wallace, 52 Fed. Rep. 438.

There is abundant evidence in the record to support the finding of the court. The defendant's label is a palpable imitation in form and design of the plaintiffs' label. Both have the same general appearance, except in color—one being blue, the other red.

Both have crescent-shaped neck labels for the bottle, lined and lettered in similar form. Both have the word "Sarsaparilla" at the top of the label in large letters, and the word "Iron" printed in the border of the lower half of the label. Both have parallel lines running across the middle of the label with the name of the manufacturers between the same. The monogram of the defendants occupies the same position upon their label as the trademark of the plaintiffs upon the label of the latter. Both labels have the words, "A great blood purifier," and "Cures all skin diseases," printed in the lower half of the label. In fact the only material difference between the two labels in design and appearance exists in the colors, but this is no defense. Browne, Trademarks, § 286. The difference in color is a mere probative fact,—a circumstance to be considered by the court in determining the ultimate question as to whether the defendants' devices so closely resembled the plaintiffs' labels as to deceive the public. The court below has found the fact that the purchasers have been deceived by the acts of the defendants, and we cannot say that this finding is not supported by the evidence. As was said in McLean v. Fleming, supra: "What degree of resemblance is necessary to constitute an infringement is incapable of exact definition as applicable to all cases. All that courts of justice can do in that regard is to say that no trader can adopt a trademark so resembling that of another trader as that ordinary purchasers buying with ordinary caution are likely to be misled." See also Improved Fig Syrup Co. v. California Fig Syrup Co. 54 Fed. Rep. 178, 7 U. S. App.—. The testimony shows clearly that the size, form, design, ornamentation, and phraseology of plaintiffs' label were studiously followed by the defendants in the preparation of their own, and that the latter was used and intended to be used as a close imitation of the plaintiffs' label, and for the purpose of leading the public to believe that the beverage contained in the bottles upon which the defendants' labels were placed was the identical article manufactured by the plaintiffs.

3. The appellants insist that the plaintiffs should not be allowed to recover any damages, because of the delay in commencing this action. This claim is set up for the first time in this court, and appears to be an afterthought. There is nothing in the answer, or in the report of the proceedings at the trial below, indicating an intention to set up such a defense. The point ought to have been raised at least at the time the motion for a nonsuit was made, the facts having come out in the evidence of the plaintiffs; but conceding for the purposes of the discussion that, notwithstanding the failure of the defendants to set up the plea of laches until this time, it should still be considered, we think the contention is not supported by the admitted facts. The action was commenced about two years after the plaintiffs discovered the infringements, and the record shows that plaintiffs had, prior to the bringing of this action, brought suit against other infringers, and that the defendants not only had notice of this prior litigation, but had changed the color of their label on account of a decision in the court below. The doctrine of laches, as applied to stale claims in matters of trust, does not apply with full force to cases of infringement. Browne, Trademarks, § 685.

It follows from the views we have expressed that the judgment of the court is erroneous in two particulars. The plaintiffs were not entitled to a decree restraining the defendants from preparing, putting up, offering for sale, or selling the beverage in question. There is nothing in the complaint upon which a judgment awarding to plaintiffs the exclusive right to manufacture the beverage as against the defendants can be predicated. The decree is also erroneous in so far as it enjoins the defendants from making, offering for sale, or selling any beverage or article under the name of "Sarsaparilla and Iron." As we have seen, the plaintiffs have not the exclusive right to the use of those words. In other respects the decree is correct. The restraining portion of the decree should simply have enjoined the defendants from selling or offering for sale any beverage or article bearing the labels shown by Exhibit B, attached to the complaint, and from selling or offering to sell any article or beverage under any marks, signs, devices, or labels calculated or liable to deceive purchasers and consumers of plaintiffs' article, or the public generally, or to lead them, while exercising ordinary care and prudence in purchasing, to believe that the article contained in the defendants' bottles and packages is the plaintiffs' article.

The order denying the defendants' motion for a new trial is affirmed. The cause is remanded, with directions to the court below to modify the decree in accordance with the views herein expressed. As so modified the judgment will stand affirmed.

We concur: McFarland, J.; Garoutte, J.; Harrison, J.; Fitzgerald, J.

Drover's pass; assuming risk.

It seems that the weight of authorities in this country hold that the carrier is liable for injuries caused to the drover or attendant on stock, by negligence of its employees, notwithstanding that under the contract of carriage or the pass, such person assumed all risk of personal injury. New York Cent. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 627; Flinn v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 1 Houst. (Del.) 499; Indiana Cent. R. Co. v. Mundy, 21 Ind. 48, 38 Am. Dec. 339; *Ohio & M. R. APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Andrew F. Burleigh, for appellant: In accepting a free pass over the appellant's road the respondent expressly agreed to assume the risks of injury resulting from the negligent acts of appellant's employes, and has thereby precluded himself from now seeking to invoke the doctrine of respondent superior against this appellant.

Griswold v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 58 Conn. 371, 55 Am. Rep. 115; Quinby v. Boston & M. R. Co. 5 L. R. A. 846, 150 Mass. 365; Kinney v. Central R. Co. of N. J. 34 N. J. L. 513, 8 Am. Rep. 265; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Skeels, 3 W. Va. 556. See also Seybold v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 95 N. Y. 562, 47 Am. Rep. 75; Bissel v. New York Cent. R. Co. 25 N. Y. 442, 82 Am. Dec. 369; Magnin v. Dinmore, 56 N. Y. 168.

same rule of liability would apply, and the company could not limit its liability for gross negligence. Lawson v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 64 Wis. 447, 54 Am. Rep. 684.

And a shipper in charge of a market car, assuming all risk provided the carrier would take it with a passenger train, did not release the carrier for negligence. Lackawanna & B. R. Co. v. Chenewith, 52 Pa. 382, 31 Am. Dec. 168.

In International & G. N. R. Co. v. Armstrong, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 146, it is stated that the carrier cannot relieve itself of liability to the drover by his assuming all risk, but this was not the question involved.

So where the contract stipulated to "assume all risk" but the attendant did not sign it, the railroad company was liable for injury to him caused by negligence of its employes. Pitchev v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 40 N. Y. S. R. 296, 23 N. Y. S. R. 647.

So where the contract released the railroad company from all damages attending the transportation of stock, but did not contain any release from personal injuries, the carrier was liable for injuries to the attendant, and it was said that the shipper could not have assumed risk for the attendant unless he was so authorized. Porter v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 59 Hun. 177.

And a stock attendant in charge of stock is entitled to all the rights of a passenger. Indianapolis, B. & W. R. Co. v. Beaver, 41 Ind. 496.

And a plea that the drover traveled on a "free pass" and "assumed all risk" does not meet the allegation of the declaration that the pass was included in the cost of freight transportation. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Nickless, 71 Ind. 271.

Where horses were injured, it was said that 31 Vict., chap. 43, and 42 Vict., chap. 9, prohibit railway companies from protecting themselves against liability for negligence by notice, condition, or declaration. Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Vogel, 11 Can. Sup. Ct. Rep. 612.

And where a shipper with his horse, who had contracted to "load and unload" at his own risk, was hurt by a concussion of the cars after the end of the journey was reached, and he had left the car and came back to look after his horse and laid down in the car, the carrier was held bound to exercise care. Orcutt v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 45 Minn. 368.

Another class of cases holds that in the case of a passenger who is carried gratuitously by a common carrier the carrier may, by express contract, relieve himself for the mere neglect or want of ordinary care on the part of the carrier or of his servants and employes, but that he cannot relieve himself from liability for gross negligence on his part or on the part of his servants or employes.

Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Read, 37 Ill. 484, 87 Am. Dec. 260; Annas v. Milwaukee & N. W. R. Co. 67 Wis. 46, 57 Am. Rep. 888, 58 Am. Rep. 848.

Gross neglect is defined as "the want of slight diligence, or it is the want of that care which every man of common sense, however inattentive, takes of his own property."

Lawson, Carr. § 123; Story, Bailm. § 17.

A passenger who voluntarily and unnecessarily rides upon the platform of a railway car assumes the risk which that position imposes and cannot recover if he is thereby injured.

Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Langdon, 92 Pa. 21, 37 Am. Rep. 651; Hickey v. Boston & L. R. Co. 14 Allen, 439; Quinn v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 51 Ill. 495; Buel v. New York Cent. R. Co. 31 N. Y. 814, 88 Am. Dec. 371; Camden

Under a contract requiring the shipper to "load . . . at his own risk, and the person riding free to assume all risk," the company was liable for causing the death of the shipper while loading, as the pass for the person had not yet been issued, and might have been intended for another party to be in charge and not the shipper, who had not started on the trip, and the stipulation as to shipper's risk referred to stock. Stinson v. New York Cent. R. Co. 32 N. Y. 333, 88 Am. Dec. 382.

A shipper of stock riding free under a contract to take charge of the same at his own risk of personal injury, is not a gratuitous passenger, and the company is liable for injuries caused by gross negligence. Smith v. New York Cent. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 222.

But this was substantially overruled in Bissell v. New York Cent. R. Co., 26 N. Y. 442, 82 Am. Dec. 369, 29 Barb. 602, holding that where the cattle are carried at a reduced rate and the shipper is carried free, the company may relieve itself of liability by stipulation in contract for shipper to assume all risk of personal injury. The New York authorities, with the exception above (Smith v. New York Cent. R. Co. supra), follow the English rule noted infra and are recognized as in conflict with the rest of the American cases.

And other New York cases hold that the railroad company may limit its liability by proviso in the pass, "assuming all risks." Boswell v. Hudson River R. Co. 5 Bosw. 699.

So where one was riding on a stock pass and was injured by a stick of wood carelessly thrown by the engineer, the company was not liable. Distinction is made in this case between Smith v. New York Cent. R. Co., supra, in that here a pass had issued. Poucher v. New York Cent. R. Co. 49 N. Y. 233, 10 Am. Rep. 364.

And the English and Irish cases hold that the carrier may secure exemption from liability by a stipulation in the drover's pass, "Assuming all risk." McCawley v. Furness R. Co. L. R. 8 Q. Messrs. Will H. Thompson, Eduard P. Edsen, and John E. Humphries, for respondent:

The authorities applicable to the case are collected under the text in Negligence of Imposed Duties of Passenger Carriers by Chas. A. Ray, §§ 80-83.

The doctrine is thoroughly discussed in the cases of Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McGown, 65 Tex. 643, and Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Shelby, 47 Ind. 461, 17 Am. Rep. 719.

In the last-named case the court holds that the weight of authority is against the position that the company can exempt itself from negligence by a contract made with the person using a free pass.

See Cooley, Torts, 2d ed. pp. 825-827; Bishop, Non-Cont. L. §§ 1074, 1160, 1191; 3 Sutherland, Damages, 1st ed. pp. 214, 249; 2 Parsons, Cont. p. 249; Beach, Contrib. Neg. 3d ed. § 274; Patterson, Railway Accident Law, p. 419; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Faylor, 126 Ind. 126.

It is not negligence per se for a person to ride upon the platform of a street-car.

Sutherland v. Standard Life & Acc. Ins. Co.

R. Co. L. R. 4 Ir. 173, 41 L. T. N. S. 197; Neville v. Cork, etc. R. Co. 9 Ir. L. J. Rep. 69, 2 Cent. L. J. 366.

And a railroad company is not liable on the contract or on the evidence, where the stock drover on a free pass assumes all risk, except from gross carelessness of the railroad company, and his contributory negligence is the cause of the injury. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co. v. Hawk, 36 Ill. App. 337.

See also McCorkle v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 61 Iowa, 555.

So where a stock drover riding on a pass "assuming all risk" who was injured while on top of the car assisting in making up the train, cannot recover on account of contributory negligence. The question of risk assumed is not discussed. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Lindley, 6 L. R. A. 646, 43 Kan. 714.

Express agents, newboys, and the like.

An express agent or a newboy permitted to ride under a contract without paying fare is regarded according to the weight of authority as an ordinary passenger, and the carrier is liable for an injury caused to such person by the negligence of the employes of such carrier. Yeomans v. Contra Costa Steam Nav. Co. 44 Cal. 71.

And the same was held where the express company released the carrier and guaranteed against any liability for damage to its agents. Kenney v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 422; Brewer v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 11 L. R. A. 483, 124 N. Y. 59.

So where the contract was that the carrier assumed no liability. Blair v. Erie R. Co. 65 N. Y. 313, 23 Am. Rep. 55.

And the same was held where a party having the right to sell pop-oorn under a contract for pay was killed while riding on a pass which stipulated that he assumed all risk. Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 63, § 97, rendering corporations liable for causing death of passenger by gross negligence. Com. v. Vermont & M. R. Co. 108 Mass. 7.

So where the contract with a telegraph company provided that the railroad company would pass, free, employes if they have passes, the evidence that a foreman had a pass for himself and twelve men was properly excluded in an action for injury to one of the men where there was no proof that the pass had any stipulations exempting the carrier from liability. Elliott v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co. 33 N. Y. S. 861.

The court held also that a stipulation releasing the carrier in general terms from responsibility would not extend to acts of negligence. 22 L. R. A.

And it is no defense that the plaintiff who was injured was an express messenger carried under a contract with the company, which contract required him to take a hazardous place. Pennsylvania Co. v. Woodworth, 36 Ohio St. 585.

But a party who is not in the employ of the express company riding in the express car attempting to learn the route and assisting the messenger, is not entitled to the rights of a passenger. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Nichols, 8 Kan. 506, 12 Am. Rep. 473.

In Canada where the manager of the new route released the railroad company from all risk, the carrier is released from liability for injuring a newsboy by a projecting timber, while the boy was on the depot platform. Alexander v. Toronto & N. R. Co. 33 U. C. Q. B. 474, 35 U. C. Q. B. 453.

But where such assistant signed a contract assuming all risks, and the injury was not caused by fraudulent, willful, or reckless misconduct, such stipulation relieves the carrier. Higgins v. New Orleans, M. & C. R. Co. 23 La. Ann. 133. See also Woodruff v. Great Western R. Co. infra, and cases next following, as to contracts for pass.

Complimentary or gratuitous pass.

The authorities are not agreed as to the liability of a carrier where the passenger is injured while riding on a free pass, with a proviso that the holder assumes all risk, some authorities holding that the company is not exempted from gross negligence. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Read, 37 Ill. 484, 37 Am. Dec. 260.

And a special plea that plaintiff rode on a free pass limiting the liability of the carrier, was bad as it did not contain any direct denial. Kimball v. Rutland & B. R. Co. 23 Vt. 247, 63 Am. Dec. 567.

And Ohio Code, § 1307, provides that every railroad company shall be liable for damages caused by mismanagement of employes, all contracts to the contrary notwithstanding. Rose v. Des Moines Valley R. Co. 39 Iowa, 246.

And in Massachusetts a carrier is bound to exercise the same degree of care to one riding on a free pass as though he had paid his fare if there is no express stipulation to the contrary. Todd v. Old Colony & F. River R. Co. 3 Allen, 13, 30 Am. Dec. 49, 7 Allen, 207, 53 Am. Dec. 679.

And the same rule is applied by some courts where he "assumed all risk." Grand Trunk R. Co. of Canada v. Stevens, 95 U. S. 655, 24 L. ed. 685; Jacobus v. St. Paul & C. R. Co. 20 Minn. 125, 18 Am. Stiles, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case the bare legal question is up for determination whether a person riding upon a public street-car, upon a free pass, can recover for personal injuries suffered by him through the negligence of the street-railroad company's servants, when the pass had printed upon the back of it such a condition as the following: "The person accepting this pass assumes all risks of accidents, and expressly agrees that the company shall not be liable, under any circumstances, whether by negligence of their agents or otherwise, for injury to the person, or for loss or injury to the property of the person, using this pass." It is a general rule that carriers of passengers for hire cannot contract against their liability for damages for injuries to their passengers, and this rule has been frequently held to be none the less operative when the evidence of the passenger's right to travel was put in the form of a free pass, if in fact there was a consideration for the issuance of it. New York Cent. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 627; Grand Trunk R. Co. of Canada v. Stevens, 95 U. S. 655, 24 L. ed. 585. The cases

But other cases hold that the carrier is not liable to a passenger using a free pass with a stipulation "assuming all risk." Griswold v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 53 Conn. 371, 55 Am. Rep. 115; Quimby v. Boston & M. R. Co. 5 L. R. A. 346, 150 Mass. 365; Kinney v. Central R. Co. of N. J. 32 N. J. L. 407, 90 Am. Dec. 675, 84 N. J. L. 513, 3 Am. Rep. 283; Perkins v. New York Cent. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 193, 32 Am. Dec. 282; Wells v. New York Cent. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 181, aff'd 26 Barb. 641; Sutherland v. Great Western R. Co. 7 U. C. C. P. 400.

These cases sustain the position of the main case that such a contract absolves the company from liability.

And in such a case the purchase by the traveler of a ticket entitling him to a seat in the drawing-room car will not change the exemption of the railroad company. Ulrich v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co. 108 N. Y. 80, reversing 18 Daly, 129.

In Wisconsin a railroad company is not liable for the death of a party holding a free pass, containing a proviso "assuming all risk" when the injury was caused by want of ordinary care, unless the same was made a crime or was caused by wilful neglect. Under Wis. Rev. Stat., §§ 4257-4293, a carrier cannot stipulate against negligence which is a crime. Annas v. Milwaukee & N. W. R. Co. 67 Wis. 46, 57 Am. Rep. 383, 53 Am. Rep. 842.

And while a carrier cannot limit his liability in Ohio yet he can in New York, and such a contract made in New York will be upheld in Ohio. Knowlton v. Erie R. Co. 19 Ohio St. 220, 3 Am. Rep. 395.

A party riding in New Jersey on a pass assuming all risk, which pass was issued on the consideration of a lease of a pleasure resort by his employer from the carrier, has all the rights of a passenger. Camden & A. R. Co. v. Bausch (Pa.) Jan. 24, 1897.

But injury caused by the slamming of a door is not sufficient proof of negligence to render a railroad company liable. Hospes v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 29 Fed. Rep. 763.

Right of a party to the use of a pass.

The carrier is only liable for gross negligence where a party is injured while using a free pass that was issued to another person and was not transferable. Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Beggs, 85 Ill. 80, 23 Am. Rep. 613.

And the same rule of law was applied where the pass was written for "E. Price" instead of "E. Rice," and it was a question for the jury whether the holder was the proper party. Rice v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 22 Ill. App. 643, 22 L. R. A.

And where a pass was used by a reporter on "Bell's Life" which was issued to another and non-transferable, it was properly submitted to the jury whether or not the railroad which issued the pass, and caused him injury, was not accustomed to carry other reporters of the same paper on similar passes. Great Northern R. Co. v. Harrison, 10 Exch. 376, 12 C. B. 576, 26 Eng. L. & Eq. 448.

And the setting aside a verdict for $5,000 for ejecting a holder of a free pass, who refused to sign the condition on the back of the ticket assuming all liability is not an abuse of discretion. Elliott v. Western & A. R. Co. 53 Ga. 454.

But where a party was killed riding on a train, and he had a pass on his person issued to another and had a check, and was recognized as a passenger, the presumption is that he was lawfully on the train and that the falling of the bridge causing the accident occurred through the negligence of the company. Louisville, N. A. & O. R. Co. v. Thompson, 107 Ind. 442.

A woman tendering a slip of paper claiming it to be a pass, but which is not, may be ejected for not paying fare. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Herring, 57 Ill. 59.

Where the defense is that the party killed on a train was using a free pass which "assumed all risk" a replication is good which states that such pass was issued to the holder under a contract for right of way over a bridge of which he was a director. Woodruff v. Great Western R. Co. 18 U. C. Q. B. 480.

And it was a question for the jury whether a railroad company should have issued without application a ticket, under a contract in consideration of land entitling one of the firm to a ticket and transportation. Knopf v. Richmond, F. & P. R. Co. 85 Va. 799.

But in a similar case it was held that it was the company's business to see that a ticket was issued, if any was necessary. Grimes v. Minneapolis, L. & M. R. Co. 37 Minn. 66.

A receiver of a railroad is not authorized to bind the subsequent owners of the road, by a parol agreement to give a pass for life as part consideration for land conveyed. Martin v. New York, S. & W. R. Co. 36 N. J. Eq. 109.

Cases as to liability for injuries to employes of the carrier carried on contracts or passes are not included herein.

As to liability for injuries to postal clerks, see note to Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Ketcham (Ind.) 19 L. R. A. 339.

above cited expressly refrain from any expression of opinion as to what the law would be were the pass purely a gratuity, with a condition against liability. There are dozens of such cases as New York Cent. R. Co. v. Lockwood, in the reports, and the language of many of them is fully strong enough to justify counsel in claiming that they would cover the case of a gratuitous pass with conditions. However, nearly all of them are cases where drovers or other shippers, being under the necessity of accompanying their shipments of stock or other merchandise to properly care for it while in transit, were granted transportation without payment of fare eo nomine, but where the Federal Supreme Court found that there was a valuable consideration, and therefore a contract of carriage for hire. But of all the cases called to our attention, or discovered by us in a somewhat extended examination of the subject, there are but eight where the naked question of liability under a free pass with conditions was presented. There may be some others, but they are most likely to be found in New York and Illinois, where the right of a carrier to contract against liability has long been recognized in some form or other. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Read (1865), 37 Ill. 484, 87 Am. Dec. 260, held that a passenger traveling on such a pass could not recover; also, Kinney v. Central R. Co. of N. J. (1869), 34 N. J. L. 518, 5 Am. Rep. 265. Jacobus v. St. Paul & C. R. Co. (1873), 20 Minn. 125 (Gil. 110), 18 Am. Rep. 360, held the opposite, as did Ross v. Des Moines Valley R. Co. (1874), 39 Iowa, 246. Griswold v. New York & N. E. R. Co. (1885), 58 Conn. 871, 55 Am. Rep. 115; and Annas v. Milwaukee & N. W. R. Co. (1886), 67 Wis. 46, 57 Am. Rep. 388, 58 Am. Rep. 848, held there could be no recovery. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McGown, (1886), 65 Tex. 648, followed Minnesota and Iowa; but Quimby v. Boston & M. R. Co. (1890), 150 Mass. 365, 5 L. R. A. 846, decided against recovery.

The Iowa case was largely based upon a statute of that state, which was construed to prohibit any attempt at limitation by the carrier. We have given these cases in their order of time, so that it may be seen that there is no absolute weight of authority on this subject. The language of the most of the text-books, of which a dozen or more have been cited, is, so far as any opinion is expressed, for the most part favorable to a right of recovery in such cases; but Beach on Contributory Negligence (sec. 172) and Patterson's Railway Accident Law (page 505) are the only books of this class which give any consideration to the cases above cited.

There can be no question as to the propriety of that rule of law which prohibits a common carrier from forcing upon any person who deals with it in its public capacity a condition against liability arising from its own negligence. The very idea of a public or common carrier, with its features of monopoly and right of eminent domain, bears with it, to the modern mind, the duty of conveying passengers with safety, so far as its own acts are concerned, upon the payment of reasonable compensation. The duty which the carrier owes to the public and to the individual is to perform the service safely, without any limiting conditions; and therefore such conditions, when the imposition of them is attempted, violate an implied duty, and are justly held void. But when the intending passenger proposes to the carrier that it do something for him which it is not, under any conceivable circumstances, required by law or duty to do, viz. to carry him without any compensation whatever, and when the whole matter is at the option of either party to agree or not, it is difficult to see why public policy should step in, and deny the right of the carrier to limit its chances of loss in the operation, even though a careless servant cause unintentional injury to the passenger. The theory that the granting of passes upon conditions like this will tend to demoralize the servants of railway and other carriers, and thereby imperil the limbs and lives of paying passengers, seems to us mere fancy; and yet this is about the only consideration urged by those courts which hold that there is a public policy in the way of such agreements. Absolutely gratuitous passes represent but an infinitesimal portion of the mileage actually traveled, and of all the passengers carried but an infinitesimal number are injured by the carrier's negligence. The precautions adopted by managers and employes of land and water transportation companies are not gauged by the fact that there may be free passengers aboard, and never will be while the doctrine of respondent superior has its present healthy existence. Considerations of business success, of competition, of the preservation of expensive machinery, of continuance in employment, of the safety of their own lives and limbs, and, to some extent at least, of humanity, have incalculably more influence upon the servants of these carriers in making them careful than any thought of damage suits in favor of free passengers. It is only in the rarest instances that disasters of this kind occur through recklessness, or through any other cause than the innate weakness of human nature, which cannot forever maintain a perfect guard. The cases from Massachusetts, New Jersey, and Wisconsin, above cited, seem to us to present, by conclusive argument, the better reason on this subject, and we adopt the views therein expressed, and hold that the person who accepts a pass with such conditions indorsed on it as those alleged in this case is bound by their terms. It follows that the demurrer to the first defense should have been overruled.

The nonsuit asked by appellant was properly refused. We do not think it can be said that it is negligence per se for a passenger to stand upon the front platform of the trail car in a moving cable train, in the absence of any rule of the company against it, and where it has been the custom for passengers to occupy that position. Doubtless there is more liability that accidents will occur where a car is propelled by cable than where horses are used, but common experience has not discriminated between the two to the extent of changing the rule of law. In most cases of this class the question of contribution is one for the jury. Wills v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 129 Mass. 351; Nolan v. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. 87 N. Y. 63, 41 Am. Rep. 845.

If the question of the conditional pass be not in the case, and the jury find that the appellant was negligent in causing the sudden stoppage of the car, and that no failure of respondent to use ordinary care to preserve himself from the danger of such accidents contributed proximately to produce his injury, then, upon a new trial, respondent will be entitled to recover; otherwise he will not.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer to the first defense, and proceed with a new trial.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Missouri, ex rel. Adam FLICKINGER,

v.
Daniel D. FISHER.

(.....Mo.....)

A dentist, though having a diploma from a reputable dental college and on the roll of dental surgeons and registered according to law, is not exempt from jury duty, under Rev. Stat. 1889, § 6062, as a "practitioner of medicine."

(December 5, 1893.)

APPPLICATION for a writ of mandamus to compel defendant to recognize relator's exemption from jury duty on the ground that he was a doctor of dental surgery. Denied. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Selden P. Spencer for relator.
Messrs. W. C. Marshall and W. L. Bruce for respondent.

Sherwood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this original proceeding for a mandamus, the single question presented is whether the relator, a dentist, and who appends to his name "D. D. S.," is liable to do jury duty under the laws of this state. Among those exempt under the general laws of this state is "a person exercising the functions of a . . . practitioner of medicine." Rev. Stat. 1889, § 6062. Under the provisions of section 8, article 21, of the Scheme and Charter (Rev. Stat. 1889, p. 2162), "every male citizen of this state, resident in such city, sober and intelligent, of good reputation, over twenty-one years of age, and not exempt from jury duty by the general laws of this state, or otherwise disqualified or excused as provided in this act, shall be deemed to be qualified for and subject to the performance of jury duty under the provisions hereof." Section 9 of the same article then proceeds to define who are exempt from jury duty, and among them specifies a person who is actually exercising the functions of "a practitioner of medicine." Of laws in pari materia with those mentioned is chapter

110, Rev. Stat. 1889, p. 1612. This chapter is entitled, "Medicine, Surgery, and Dentistry," and consists of three articles,—the first "Medicine and Surgery;" the second, "Disposition of Human Bodies;" and the third, "Dentistry." These articles were originally separate acts, approved at different times. Laws 1883, p. 114, approved February 20; Id. p. 115, approved April 2; and Laws 1887, p. 215, approved March 31, relating to dead bodies. Those acts, however, like the diversified contents of the great sheet, knit at the four corners, that Peter saw in his vision, have been gathered together in all their incongruity in the present revision, and now form chapter 110. Section 6871, article 1, of that chapter provides that "every person practicing medicine and surgery, in any of their departments, shall possess the qualifications required by this article," to wit: If the applicant is a graduate of medicine, he must present his diploma to the state board of health, etc.; and thereupon that board issues its certificate to the applicant, and such diploma and certificate are made conclusive of the right of the holder of the same to practice medicine in this state. Other provisions are inserted in the section with respect to the steps necessary to be taken by those who are not graduates of medicine, but who also desire to practice it, etc. To this end two kinds of certificates are provided to be issued by the board,—one for graduates who possess diplomas, and the other for those not graduates who have stood a successful examination before the board as to their qualifications. Without such certificate of one sort or the other, no one can lawfully practice medicine and surgery in any of their departments in this state. State v. Gregory, 83 Mo. 123, 53 Am. Rep. 565. Section 6881 of the same chapter and article denounces certain penalties against those who shall practice medicine or surgery in this state without complying with the provisions of this article, to wit, a fine of not less than $50, nor more than $500, or by imprisonment in the county jail not less than thirty, nor more than three hundred and sixty-five days, or by both such fine and imprisonment. Section 6869 of article 3, entitled "Dentistry," makes it unlawful for any person to practice dentistry or dental surgery in this state without being the possessor of a diploma, etc. No provision, however, is made for the presentation of such diploma to the board of health, nor for any examination by that board of the applicant touching his qualifications. The applicant simply presents his diploma to the county clerk or city register, as the case may be, and receives a certificate, which is made "prima facie evidence of the right of the holder to practice under this article." Section 6893 of that article prescribes a penalty for violating the provisions of such article, to wit, by a fine not less than $25, nor more than $200. These different penalties under articles 1 and 3 evidently go to show that the legislature regarded the violation of article 1 by a physician as a more serious offense, and therefore to be punished more severely, than a violation of article 3 by a dentist. In a word, by those very penalties they drew a distinction between a doctor and a dentist. Relator relies on a certificate obtained under the provisions of article 8 aforesaid, from the city register, on presentation to the latter by relator of his diploma, which certificate, among other things, states that relator's name had been entered on the "roll of dental surgeons" in the city register's office. Looking at all these statutory provisions bearing on the point in hand, the question mentioned at the outset recurs to the mind: Do those provisions, or any of them, exempt relator from the performance of jury duty? The general laws of this state, as already seen, as well as the provisions of sections 8 and 9 of the Scheme and Charter, exempt only certain persons from the performance of that duty. Has relator brought himself within any exemption therein contained? The prevalent rule in construing statutes is that the expression of one thing is the exclusion of another. Anderson, Law Dict. "Espresso," etc. An express exception, exemption, or saying excludes all others (Brocket v. Ohio & P. R. Co. 14 Pa. 241, 53 Am. Dec. 534), and, when a general rule has been established by a statute with exceptions, the courts will not curtail the former, nor add to the latter, by implication (Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 338; Tyson v. Britton, 6 Tex. 224; Roberts v. Yarboro, 41 Tex. 450; United States v. Dickson, 40 U. S. 15 Pet. 165, 10 L. ed. 698). Here relator claims the force and benefit of a certain exception which he asserts takes his case out of the operation of the general statute which compels the performance of jury duty by all male citizens, resident, etc. In order to avail himself of such exception he must show that his case falls strictly within it, since exceptions, privileges, and exemptions are not favored in the law. And in this investigation the familiar rule laid down by Lord Bacon is peculiarly apposite, "that, as exceptions strengthen the force of a general law, so enumeration weakens, as to things enumerated." Page v. Allen, 58 Pa. 388, 98 Am. Dec. 272. Service on juries is one of the general burdens imposed upon the male citizens of a state, and all men who receive the advantages of government are bound to contribute to its support, and "none can claim exemption unless the exemption be so clearly expressed in the statute as to admit of no other construction." Miller v. Kirkpatrick, 29 Pa. 226. The state has an inherent and indisputable right to the service of all her male citizens as jurors, and therefore any statute which strips the government of any portion of its prerogative in this regard, by giving exemption from this general burden should receive a strict construction. Academy of Fine Arts v. Philadelphia County, 23 Pa. 496. Here it cannot be successfully claimed that relator finds any exemption in the terms of the statute, for certainly he is not a "practitioner of medicine and surgery in any of their departments," as defined in section 6871, nor does he exhibit the qualifications required by that section, to wit, a diploma from a legally chartered medical institution in good standing and a certificate from the board of health. His contention, stripped of all verbiage and disguises, and stated baldly and boldly, simply is that, inasmuch as he possesses a diploma granted him by a reputable dental college, and a certificate of the city register showing the filing of that diploma, and the enrollment of his name on the "roll of dental surgeons," that therefore he is entitled to the same exemptions from jury service as if, instead of qualifying under the provisions of section 6869, he had actually qualified under those of section 6871. This contention, for reasons already given, cannot prevail; it will not bear a moment's scrutiny. Either relator is a practitioner of medicine and surgery, or he is not. If not, that determines this litigation against him. If he is such practitioner, then this fact avails him nothing until he complies with the terms and conditions of section 6871 and its associate sections. The law, by the terms it employs, means a lawful "practitioner of medicine," not one who fails to comply with its requirements. Relator makes no pretense of such compliance. The statute in question being couched in unambiguous terms, its words are to be taken "in their plain or ordinary and usual sense." Rev. Stat. 1889, § 6570.

NOTE.—The above case presents a question that is somewhat difficult as well as new, but which is liable to arise in almost any jurisdiction. The status of dentists as members of the medical profession under recent statutes regulating their business and requiring a license for its exercise is subject to some 23 L. R. A.

For judicial review of action of boards in respect to such licenses, see note to Iowa Eclectic Medical College Assn. v. Schrader (Iowa) 20 L. R. A. 355.

Relator evidently feels unsteady on his logical legs if his sole reliance is to be on the statutory exemptions heretofore noted, and so he resorts to the lexicographers, and quotes from the Century Dictionary, where "dentist" is thus defined: "One whose profession it is to clean and extract teeth, repair them when diseased, and replace them, when necessary, by artificial ones; one who practices dental surgery and mechanical dentistry; a dental surgeon." If relator had delved more deeply into the science of definitions, and had turned another page of the same work, he would have found: "Chiropodist. One who treats diseases or malformations of the hands or feet; especially a surgeon for the feet, hands and nails; a cutter or extractor of corns and callosities; a corn doctor." So that if relator is exempt from jury duty because, as he says, he "treats, professionally, diseases of the oral cavity," so also is his less pretentious professional brother, who with equal scientific skill treats diseases or malformations of the hands or feet, and who is content to be dubbed "corn doctor." Certainly, the argument and the definition which would support the exemption of the dentist as a "practitioner of medicine and surgery" would also equally support that of his cognate scientist, albeit of humbler professional pretensions. The disposition of persons to magnify and exalt their callings or occupations has become wonderfully prevalent in these latter days. He who shoves a jack plane and wields a saw is no longer a "carpenter" but an "architect and builder;" the solicitor of orders from our retail merchants is no longer a "drummer," but a "commercial traveler;" and the loquacious individual who scrapes your chin is no longer a "barber," but a "tonsorial artist." But this euphemistic style of dressing things in different and more high-sounding verbiage does not alter their essential nature, nor have the least tendency to evade the force and effect of the statutes pointing out those who are subject to jury duty, and those exempt therefrom.

The premises considered, we hold that, on the facts presented in this record, relator is not exempt from jury duty, and hence deny the peremptory writ.

Brace, J., dissenting:

The question for our consideration upon the return in this case is whether the relator, who is a graduate of a reputable college of dental surgery, duly registered, and engaged in the practice of dentistry and dental surgery in the city of St. Louis, is exempt from jury service under the provisions of section 9, article 21, of the law governing courts in the city of St. Louis, and section 6062, Rev. Stat. 1899, which, upon this subject, are the same in substance. The question turns upon the meaning of the provision that "no person exercising the function of practitioner of medicine shall be compelled to serve on any jury." The subject of the qualification of jurors, and the exemption of certain citizens from jury service, has always, in this state, been purely a subject of statutory regulation; the first act having been passed by the territorial legislature in 1808, before the common law of England was introduced into the territory (1 Terr. Laws, p. 198, § 2), in which "practitioners of physic" were exempted from service on juries. This law was repealed in 1810, and a new one passed, by which "all persons exercising the function of practitioner of physic" were exempted. This continued to be the law until after the admission of the territory into the Union as a state, when in 1825 a new act was passed, providing that "no person exercising the functions of a practitioner of physic shall be compelled to serve on any grand or petit jury." This act was revised in 1835, in which revision the provision reads: "No person exercising the functions of a practitioner of physic shall be compelled to serve on a jury." Rev. Stat. 1835, p. 843, § 9. In the revision of 1845 it appears in precisely the same language as in the revision of 1835 (Rev. Stat. 1845, p. 627, § 9), and also in the revision of 1855; except the word "physic" was changed to "medicine;" and, as thus changed, the provision has been carried into every revision since. So that the law on this subject is not only exclusively statutory, but is the same as it has always been since the sovereignty of the state began. Service upon a jury of the country is a privilege as well as a duty, and, however regarded by the individual in any particular case, is, in fact and in law, a position of honor and trust, charged with the gravest responsibility, from the discharge of the duties of which no citizen ought to be exempted who is personally fit for the position, except for the general welfare. Exemption from jury service is not granted as a personal favor, but for the public comfort and convenience, and in the light of this reason for its existence should the law governing such service be interpreted and administered. While the law on this subject, and the reason for its existence, remains the same to-day as on the day of its first enactment, its application now is not so simple as it was in the beginning, and for many years thereafter. While the early practitioners of medicine in the state were not necessarily M. D.'s or doctors of medicine in the technical sense of the schools, they were all called "doctors," and as such exercised the functions of doctors of medicine, surgeons, and dentists, and generally treated indiscriminately all the ailments that human flesh and bone is heir to, whether external or internal, according to the light they possessed; and such continued to be the case down to the memory of the present generation, and doubtless still remains so in many of the rural districts of the state. But in the cities and more populous districts we find now the functions formerly exercised by the doctor or practitioner of medicine of the olden time divided up and exercised by specialists, each confining himself generally to the practice of a particular branch or department of the science, such as surgeons, dentists, oculists, aurists, etc. While dentistry, as an independent calling, may have had an humble and comparatively recent origin, it has now become a very important branch of medical science (Address N. S. Davis, M. D., Pres. Am. Med. Asso.), and there are but few who have arrived at the age of those who are usually called to serve as jurors who would not testify that, when the exercise of its functions become necessary, it is as exigent as the exercise of most of the other functions of the general practitioner. The fact that this branch of the medical profession has grown to such proportions as to have its own independent colleges, and to confer its own degrees, and that it has become necessary that its practice should be regulated by statute (2 Rev. Stat. 1899, chap. 110, art. 3), indicates the importance of the exercise of its functions to the public welfare. The fact that it is regulated in a separate article and as an independent calling from that of an M. D. does not in any manner affect the character of those functions. When in 1874

the legislature first began the regulation of the practice of medicine by general law, they were careful to preserve the exercise of the functions of the old practitioner of medicine to him, by exempting him from the operation of its provisions (Laws 1874, p. 111, § 8; Laws 1877, p. 343, § 1); and, whatever changes may have been made in the law since on this subject, the question of jury service or exemption therefrom is not treated therein, and they have nothing to do with the question in hand. The relator, under the present law, is authorized to exercise all the functions thus recognized that belong to his department of medicine. They are now more extensive, more important, and more exigent to the public welfare than they ever were before. He is within the purview of both the letter and reason of the law that exempts; "a practitioner of medicine" from jury duty, and should have a peremptory writ commanding his discharge. NOTE.—Preferences among creditors given by insolvent corporations.

It is generally held that a corporation may make an assignment of all its property for the payment of creditors, in the absence of any statutory restriction. Pope v. Brandon, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 401, 20 Am. Dec. 49; Thorington v. Gould, 59 Ala. 461; DeCamp v. Alward, 52 Ind. 468; Merrick v. Bank of the Metropolis, 8 Gill, 59; Sargent v. Webster, 13 Met. 497, 46 Am. Ch.* 307; Smith v. Clinton Co. 12 N. H. 431; Lamb v. Cecil, 25 W. Va. 288, and in nearly all other cases in which the question is involved and which are cited to other propositions in this note.

In some states, as in New York, the statutes have prohibited any transfer of property after or in contemplation of insolvency.

Under a statute authorizing "any person" to make an assignment for creditors, it is held that the word "person" applies to a corporation. Shockley v. Fisher, 75 Mo. 498.

The power of a board of directors without authorization of the stockholders to make such an assignment is somewhat in dispute, but that question will not be entered upon here as the subject of preferences only is here considered.

When the assignment of a corporation for creditors involves any preference between the creditors, the question becomes a somewhat disputed one, although the early cases seemed generally to regard the right to make preference as inhering in the right to make an assignment. The earlier cases therefore uphold preferences in such cases with but very little discussion of the question.

Among these early cases were Dana v. Bank of United States, 5 Watts & S. 223; Warner v. Mower, 11 Vt. 390; Burr v. McDonald, 3 Gratt. 215; Ex parte Conway, 4 Ark. 348; Ringo v. Biscoe, 13 Ark. 563; Catlin v. Eagle Bank, 6 Conn. 238; New Haven Sav. Bank v. Bates, 8 Conn. 505; Bank of United States v. Huth, 4 B. Mon. 423; Lexington L. & M. F. Ins. Co. v. Page, 17 B. Mon. 412, 66 Am. Dec. 166; State v. Bank of Maryland, 6 Gill & J. 206, 28 Am. Dec. 561.

In United States v. Bank of United States, 8 Rob. (La.) 282, in which Pennsylvania law governed, it 22 L. R. A.

was held that such preferences were valid in Pennsylvania.

In Town v. Bank of River Raisin, 3 Dougl. (Mich.) 530, such preferences by insolvent corporations are disapproved by the court, but held lawful in the absence of legislative prohibition.

And this decision is followed in Covert v. Rogers, 38 Mich. 383, 31 Am. Rep. 319.

In Hopkins v. Gallatin Turnp. Co., 4 Humph. 403, an assignment of all the property of a corporation by way of mortgage was upheld, although it was to secure only part of the debts.

In Schroeder v. Mason, 25 Mo. App. 190, a transfer of property in payment of a valid debt, although creating in effect a preference of that creditor is held valid.

So in the case of a transfer of securities creating a preference, it is held that such preferences are not unlawful. Ahl v. Rhoads, 84 Pa. 819.

In Commercial Nat. Bank v. Burch, 40 Ill. App. 506, it is said to be by no means settled that an insolvent corporation may not prefer particular creditors.

And in Reichwald v. Commercial Hotel Co., 106 Ill. 489, it is held that an insolvent corporation may make such preferences in the absence of statutory restrictions,—especially where the law under which the corporation was created confers the right to acquire and transfer property with the same rights as an individual.

Again in Ragland v. McFall, 137 Ill. 81, it is held that a corporation may prefer a creditor and turn over property in payment of his debt, if done in good faith without any fraudulent purpose.

In Arkansas it is established that an insolvent corporation may make preferences among its creditors, and this doctrine is followed by a federal court in that state. Gould v. Little Rock, M. R. & T. R. Co. 52 Fed. Rep. 680.

The court in that case says: "The established rule in that state is in harmony with the general though not quite uniform current of authorities in this country on the question."

In Iowa it is well settled that an insolvent corporation may lawfully mortgage all its property for the security of a portion of its debts, even though nothing is left for the payment of those unsecured. Rollins v. Shaver Wagon & C. Co. 80 Iowa, 869.

tial deed of assignment after insolvency and permanent cessation of business.

3. The "business" of a corporation, within a statutory authority to contract in "its authorized business" cannot be construed to include the making of a preferential deed of trust after the corporation has become insolvent and ceased to carry on its operations, without any intention of resuming.

QUESTIONS CERTIFIED by the Court of Civil Appeals for the Second Supreme Judicial District for the opinion of the Supreme Court in an action brought to set aside certain chattel mortgages given by the Lyons-Thomas Hardware Company as a fraud upon their creditors, in which a judgment had been rendered in favor of plaintiffs and defendant had appealed to the Court of Civil Appeals. Answers favorable to plaintiffs given.

On November 9, 1889, the Lyons-Thomas Hardware Co., a private trading corporation, being insolvent, made certain chattel mortgages in which they preferred the claims of certain other creditors, and the assets of the corporation were transferred to L. P. Harrison as trustee. Plaintiffs filed a creditors' bill asking the appointment of a receiver, and that the assets be paid to all the creditors ratably, attacked the mortgages as void for want of power to make them, because the corporation, being a private trading corporation and insolvent, having ceased to be a "going concern," could not prefer its creditors or pledge its property to part of them only, its assets being a trust fund for the payment of all creditors ratably. The mortgages were declared void, and the mortgagees appealed. The case was transferred from the supreme court to the court of civil appeals and that court certified the questions indicated in the opinion of the supreme court to the supreme court for answer.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

In Maryland it is held that a corporation in failing circumstances may, like any other debtor, unless restrained by some express provision in its charter, make a preference among creditors on an assignment of its property to trustees. State v. Bank of Maryland, 6 Gill & J. 205, 38 Am. Dec. 561.

In Mississippi it is held that an insolvent corporation may make a preferential assignment for creditors. Palmer v. George W. Hutchison Grocery Co. (Miss.) Oct. 17, 1893.

In Michigan it is not unlawful for an insolvent corporation to give preferences to creditors by way of mortgage. Bank of Montreal v. Potts Salt & Lumber Co. 90 Mich. 345.

In Warner v. Littlefield, 89 Mich. 329, a chattel mortgage made to one who was not himself a creditor, giving a preference to creditors of an insolvent corporation, was attacked on the ground that it constituted a general assignment for creditors, but was upheld.

Sheldon v. Mann, 85 Mich. 385, made substantially the same decision in respect to several chattel mortgages.

A chattel mortgage creating a preference is upheld in Michigan, although made at substantially the same time as a general assignment, if the mortgagee does not know of the contemplated assignment. Whipple v. Stebbins, 67 Mich. 507.

The case of Kendall v. Bishop, 70 Mich. 684, held that an instrument called a chattel mortgage constituted in effect a transfer of all the property of the insolvent corporation, and was a general assignment in fact. But this case is distinguished in Sheldon v. Mann, 85 Mich. 385, and later cases holding that a chattel mortgage is not necessarily an assignment for creditors within the prohibition of the statute, because it is made in trust.

But a chattel mortgage made as part of the same transaction, in which an assignment for creditors is made by an insolvent corporation, must be regarded as part of such assignment, and cannot be allowed to create a preference which the assignment cannot give directly. Burnham v. Haskins, 79 Mich. 35.

A chattel mortgage by an insolvent corporation cannot be upheld when it was given under an arrangement for the immediate filing of a bill in equity and the appointment of a receiver and the 23 L. R. A.

transfer of the business of the corporation, which could not be done by an assignment for creditors. Merchants & M. Nat. Bank v. Kent, 43 Mich. 238.

In the circuit court of the United States sitting in Nebraska it is held that a private corporation in a failing condition has the same common-law right that a natural person has to prefer creditors by way of payment or security. Allis v. Jones, 45 Fed. Rep. 143.

The doctrine that a corporation, in the absence of statutory restriction, has authority to prefer creditors is approved in Coats v. Donnell, 94 N. Y. 168, which upholds a preference made by an insolvent foreign corporation on the ground that the statutory restrictions upon preferences by insolvent corporations do not apply to foreign corporations.

Forster v. Mullanphy Planing Mill Co., 16 Mo. App. 150, although holding merely that a preference was not a fraud which would sustain an attachment, is quoted in Schroeder v. Mason, 26 Mo. App. 190, as authority for the doctrine that an insolvent corporation may make a preference among creditors; and it is said the corporation and its creditor may by united voluntary action do what the creditor alone could do by virtue of the law relating to attachment, and therefore a transfer of property by an insolvent corporation in payment of a bona fide debt is upheld, although creating a preference.

In New Jersey it is held that under the law as it has stood since the revision, corporations like individuals can prefer creditors, although insolvent. Bergen v. Porpoise Fishing Co. 41 N. J. Eq. 238; Wilkinson v. Bauerle, Id. 636; Vail v. Jameson, Id. 648.

The New Jersey decisions are probably influenced to some extent by the fact that preferences, and indeed any sale or transfer of the property of a corporation after, or in contemplation of insolvency, had been expressly prohibited by statutory provisions, which had been omitted from the revision of the statutes.

Under this statute while it existed, which originally became law February 16, 1829, various decisions were made denying the validity of such preferences. Coryell v. New Hope Delaware Bridge Co. 9 N. J. Eq. 457; Van Wageningen v. Paterson Sav.

a portion of its creditors to the exclusion of the other creditors, but in such case its assets are a trust fund held by it for the payment of its creditors, ratably, and such creditors have an equitable lien on the assets to secure such ratable payment, and its directors are then trustees for the creditors.

Insolvent corporations which have ceased to do business in this state, or anywhere else, Bank, 10 N. J. Eq. 13; Wells v. Rahway White Rubber Co. 19 N. J. Eq. 402.

In West Virginia the court, while holding that an insolvent corporation having ceased to do business has the same power as an insolvent individual to prefer a creditor in a general assignment of all its property for the payment of debts, declared that it would hold the contrary doctrine if it was free to do so. Pyles v. Riverside Furniture Co. 30 W. Va. 123.

The court based this decision on the fact that by an early Virginia decision (Burr v. McDonald, 3 Gratt. 286) it was established as the law in that jurisdiction that a corporation could make such preferences, except when restrained by statute; and that the only statute restricting such preferences applied to mining and manufacturing companies merely, and that this statute had not been in force for many years.

Preferences prohibited.

Preferences are in fact allowed to creditors who are not members of the corporation by nearly all the cases in which the question has been decided. The actual conflict on this point is very slight and the main case, LYONS-THOMAS HARDWARE CO. v. PERRY STOVE MFG. CO. is, although not alone in denying such preference, supported by very few cases.

The leading prior case on this point was Rouse v. Merchants Nat. Bank, 5 L. R. A. 373, 46 Ohio St. 498, which did decide broadly that insolvent corporations cannot give preferences by mortgage, and did not limit the decision to any class of creditors. But from the report of the case it appears that the mortgage was authorized by the same resolution that ordered a general assignment for creditors, and that one defense set up in the answer was that the mortgage secured an individual debt of the president of the corporation. Still these elements do not seem to have been regarded and the decision is fairly made on the doctrine that any preferences by an insolvent corporation which has ceased business are unlawful.

Following the doctrine of Rouse v. Merchants Nat. Bank, supra, the Supreme Court of the United States held that in a case arising in the circuit court of the United States in Ohio mortgages made 22 L. R. A.

by an insolvent trading corporation to prefer some of its creditors were invalid. George F. Smith Middlings Purifier Co. v. McGroarty, 134 U. S. 237, 34 L. ed. 348.

But in this case the president of the corporation was in fact one of the preferred creditors. In addition to this the court expressly declared that the Ohio law must govern.

Again in Kankakee Woolen Mill Co. v. Kampe, 38 Mo. App. 229, it was said that a corporation hopelessly insolvent cannot make a preference among its creditors, whether they are directors or strangers. But here also the case involved a preference to a director.

In Haywood v. Lincoln Lumber Co., 64 Wis. 639, the mortgage to secure directors was authorized by a vote when a majority of the quorum vote were interested as creditors. But it is said in the case that an insolvent corporation can make "no preferences to any one of the creditors, much less to the directors or trustees, as such." The court says that it has found this principle recognized in every case, but, as will be seen, there are numerous cases in which the principle is fully denied.

Other cases denying preferences have been those in which the attempted preferences were to officers or members of the corporation or else those in which the statutes prohibited preferences.

In Wisconsin the statute makes every assignment void, if it gives any preference to one creditor over another, except for wages. Conlee Lumber Co. v. Ripon Lumber & Mfg. Co. 66 Wis. 481.

Under the Georgia statute transfers to create preferences by a corporation, which is insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, are prohibited. Hightower v. Mustain, 8 Ga. 506.

And under a similar statute mortgages creating preferences are invalid. Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Claghorn, 1 Speers, Eq. 545.

The reinsurance by a New York insurance company of all policies issued from its home office when it was involved in consequence of heavy losses sustained in the Chicago fire, and when the company was in fact insolvent, although this was not known to the officers, made as a temporary expedient, with the expectation of resuming the reinsurance policies when the Chicago losses were adjusted, was held to constitute a preference in favor of except where allowed to do so by statute, and which have no intention nor the ability to go on and carry out the objects of their creation, have no right to execute mortgages preferring their creditors, having no lien on their assets, but in such case the creditors have a lien in equity and the assets are in such case a trust fund for the payment of the debts ratably, and its directors or managers are trustees for the creditors, and hold the assets for that purpose.

Tobin Canning Co. v. Fraser, 81 Tex. 407; Morgan County v. Allen, 108 U. S. 508, 509, 26 L. ed. 502; 1 Jones, Liens, §§ 84-86.

Creditors of an insolvent corporation which has ceased to carry on the business for which it was created, have a right in equity to file a creditor's bill to arrest an illegal or fraudulent transfer of its assets, and to recover them from whomsoever they may be found in possession of, without first having reduced their claims to judgment, and in such case they have a lien in equity on the assets and can follow them and take them, unless they have passed into the hands of an innocent purchaser, for a valuable consideration without notice.

Kankakee Woolen Mill Co. v. Kampe, 88 Mo. App. 229; Story, Eq. §§ 827, 835, 851; Innes v. Lansing, 7 Paige, 588, 4 L. ed. 288.

those insured by the home policies to the extent that the premiums paid for reinsurance diminished the fund applicable to the payment of all losses; and such insurance was a violation of 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 5th ed. 519, §§ 9, 10, prohibiting the transfer of the effects of a corporation in contemplation of insolvency with intent to give a preference. Cassery v. Mannera, 9 Hun, 695.

The invalidity of a transfer of a mortgage as security by an insolvent corporation will not defeat the mortgage in the hands of a bona fide purchaser. Hoyt v. Sheldon, 3 Boew. 267.

The knowledge as to insolvency of a creditor receiving a transfer or payment made by an insolvent corporation, or in contemplation of insolvency, with intent to give a preference will not prevent such preference from being invalid. Brouner v. Harbeck, 9 N. Y. 594.

A pledge of securities to secure the payment of bonds issued by an insolvent corporation to obtain funds for use in its business will not constitute an unlawful transfer or assignment under the New York statute, if not made with intent to prefer one creditor over another, but with an honest expectation to continue business and pay all debts. Curtis v. Leavitt, 15 N. Y. 110.

So one who takes a chattel mortgage in good faith from a corporation which is insolvent, but alive and active, is as fully protected as if dealing with an individual. Manhattan Brass Co. v. Webster Glass & Q. Co. 37 Mo. App. 145.

And a mortgage by a corporation which is in fact insolvent will not be regarded as an invalid preference if that is not its intent; but if it was given merely to obtain an extension of credit and the company was then endeavoring to carry on its business. Damarin v. Huron Iron Co. 47 Ohio St. 581.

But the question what transfers must be regarded as made in contemplation of insolvency, or when a corporation is to be deemed insolvent is not entered upon in this note.

Although an insolvent corporation in New Jersey may prefer creditors, a mortgage creating such a preference pending a suit to wind up the affairs of the corporation, in which an injunction against mortgage or other disposal of its property had been issued, is invalid. Bissell v. Beason, 47 N. J. Eq. 580.

An insolvent corporation, when it intends to immediately cease to do business, or further carry out the objects of its creation, has no right to convey all its assets to a trustee, giving preference to a portion of its creditors, nor can it thus prefer its members and stockholders.

See 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. §§ 861-868; Panhandle Nat. Bank v. Emery, 78 Tex. 498; Thompson, Liability of Stockholders, § 267; McDonnell v. Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. 85 Ala. 401, 26 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 261; Central Agr. & M. Assn. v. Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. 70 Ala. 120, 8 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 78; Stee v. Bloom, 19 Johns. 456; Briggs v. Penniman, 8 Cow. 887.

Stayton, Oh. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The questions submitted by the court of civil appeals for decision are: "(1) Whether or not a preferential deed of trust executed by a private trading corporation (chartered in July, 1884, under general law) after it has become insolvent, and consequently ceased to carry on its business, without any intention of resuming the enterprise, is void as against the unsecured creditors of Preferences by a bank which is insolvent, or made in contemplation of insolvency, are prohibited by special act in Georgia, Code, § 4429. Hill v. Western & A. R. Co. 86 Ga. 284.

An insolvent bank which transfers securities in payment of drafts on which a loan had been obtained makes an assignment which is prohibited by 1 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 608, § 4 (pt. 1, chap. 18, title 4). Robinson v. Bank of Attica, 21 N. Y. 406.

A transfer of bills of exchange by an insolvent bank to a depositor, with intent to give him a preference, cannot be upheld on the ground that his deposits had been received after the bank officers knew of its insolvency, where the bills of exchange were not a part of the deposits made by him. Atkinson v. Rochester Printing Co. 114 N. Y. 168.

Payment of a check by a bank while it continues in business, to a depositor ignorant of its insolvency, is not within the prohibition of the New York statute against a transfer or assignment in contemplation of insolvency. Dutcher v. Importers & T. Nat. Bank, 59 N. Y. 5.

By U. S. Rev. Stat., 5242, assignments or transfers by an insolvent national bank and to prefer creditors and attachments against such banks from state courts are made unlawful, but the interpretation and application of that section constitutes a distinct subject, which is not here entered upon.

Stockholders as preferred creditors.

Where insolvent corporations are allowed to make preferences among creditors, a stockholder may be a preferred creditor. Burr v. McDonald, 3 Gratt. 215; Lexington L. & M. F. Co. v. Page, 17 B. Mon. 412, 66 Am. Dec. 165; Reichwald v. Commercial Hotel Co. 106 Ill. 489.

And a stockholder may obtain such preference by transfer of property. Reichwald v. Commercial Hotel Co. supra.

But in Swepeon v. Exchange & D. Bank, 9 Lea, 713, it was held that the sole stockholder of an insolvent bank could not take a conveyance of its property in payment for his debt to the exclusion of other creditors.

Insolvency of a corporation will not prevent a creditor from getting security if he can while the corporation is a going concern and the directors intend to continue business, even if he might push such corporation. (3) If a private corporation, under such circumstances, has the same power to prefer its creditors as an individual, whether such preferential deed is void in law because of the fact that the stockholders, directors, and other officers of the corporation, who executed in the name of the corporation, are liable as sureties and indorsers on the preferred claims." Both questions present a case in which, on account of insolvency, the corporation had ceased to carry on business, and had no intention at any time to resume, when the instrument was executed through which preference was intended to be given. The corporation was one having no powers other than such as are given by the laws of this state regulating incorporation under the general law, which of course will embrace powers, although not expressly given, that are necessary to the exercise of those which are. It is contended, however, that such corporations have all the powers to give preferences which a person has, so long as the corporate existence continues, unless such power is denied by the common law or by the statutes of this state; and, in support of this proposition, reference is made to the opinion in case of Riche v. Asbury Railway Car- riage Iron Co., L. R. 9 Exch. 263, in which the court was considering the powers conferred on corporations created under general acts of parliament. In the course of the opinion, referring to the case of Sutton Hospital, 10 Coke, 30, it was said that was "an express authority that at common law it is an incident to a corporation to use its common seal for the purpose of binding itself to anything to which a natural person could bind himself, and to deal with its property as a natural person might deal with his own; and, further, that an attempt to forbid this, on the part of the king, even by express negative words, does not bind the law. . . . I take it that the true rule of law is . . . a corporation, at common law, has, as an incident given by law, the same power to contract, and subject to the same restrictions, that a natural person has." The question involved in that case was whether a certain transaction was ultra vires, and its solution depended on the question whether corporations incorporated under the general law had the same powers as what may be termed "common-law corporations." On appeal to the house of lords, it was held that a company created a corporation under the general his claim to judgment and force the corporation into liquidation. Commercial Nat. Bank v. Bureh, 40 Ill. App. 505.

Directors and officers as preferred creditors.

The most serious conflict between the courts on the question of preferences by insolvent corporations is in reference to the preference of debts of directors. In a few states the doctrine that corporations may prefer creditors is followed to its full extent, and preferences to the directors themselves, although obtained by virtue of their superior knowledge of the condition of the corporation, are upheld. Such is the law in Michigan.

A mortgage by an insolvent corporation in trust to secure debts on which the directors are liable as indorsers is held by the circuit court of the United States in Michigan to be valid. Hills v. Stockwell & D. Furniture Co. 23 Fed. Rep. 432.

See also BROWN v. GRAND RAPIDS PARLOR FURNITURE CO. post, —

In Buell v. Buckingham, 16 Iowa, 234, 85 Am. Dec. 514, which is one of the leading cases cited in support of the allowance of preferences to directors, the director obtained his preference by a purchase of property of the corporation for more than its real value, and in addition to the discharge of his own debt assumed, as part of the consideration for the property, the payment of other debts. But it is said in that case: "Being an officer in the corporation did not deprive Buell of the right to enter into competition with other creditors, and run a race of diligence with them, availing himself in the contest of his superior knowledge and of the advantages of his position to obtain security for the payment of his debt."

This is established law in Iowa and the fact that a preference by an insolvent corporation is exercised in favor of directors or shareholders is immaterial, although they may have voted for the proposition to secure their own debts. Warfield v. Marshall County Canning Co. 72 Iowa, 667; Garratt v. Burlington Plow Co. 70 Iowa, 697, 59 Am. Rep. 461.

In Virginia also preferences to directors are upheld. Planters Bank v. Whittle, 78 Va. 737.

In Lamb v. Cecil, 25 W. Va. 288, a preference to directors of an insolvent bank was held invalid, 22 L. R. A.

where it was obtained by a transfer of discounted bills of the bank in excess of the cashier's authority.

This case was followed by Lamb v. Pannell, 28 W. Va. 663.

In Lamb v. Laughlin, 25 W. Va. 300, directors of a bank were held guilty for a breach of trust and also fraud, where they kept the bank open after it was insolvent to receive deposits, which they took in payment of their own deposits.

So a deed of trust to secure directors was held in Hope v. Valley City Salt Co., 25 W. Va. 799, to be fraudulent both in law and fact.

But the validity of preferences as such in West Virginia is settled in favor of the preferences, though with much reluctance without making or discussing any exception in respect to directors in the case of Pyles v. Riverside Furniture Co., 30 W. Va. 123.

In Missouri it was said in the case of Forster v. Mullanphy Planing Mill Co., 32 Mo. 79, that a deed of trust preferring creditors of an insolvent corporation is valid even though such creditors are directors of the corporation.

But the question actually decided was that an unlawful preference by an insolvent corporation for the benefit of directors is not a fraudulent conveyance which will constitute the basis of an attachment under the Missouri statute as a fraud on creditors. This was also the decision of the court of appeals. Forster v. Mullanphy Planing Mill Co. 18 Mo. App. 150.

The court holds that a fraudulent conveyance which will justify an attachment must be utterly void as to creditors and not merely voidable, so that it will create a resulting trust in favor of the creditors.

Other Missouri cases do not agree with the broad doctrine stated in the above case (32 Mo. 79). It was held in Williams v. Jackson County Patrons of Husbandry, 23 Mo. App. 132, by the court of appeals a little before the decision in 32 Mo. 79, that after a corporation is recognized to be insolvent and has ceased business directors cannot make preference of their own claims against it to the exclusion of other creditors.

And in Roan v. Winn, 93 Mo. 508, it was held that deeds by an insolvent bank to a stockholder and law providing for voluntary incorporation was not a corporation possessed of inherent common-law rights, but was limited to the powers properly embraced under the law in the memorandum of association. Asbury Railway Carriage & Iron Co. v. Riche, L. R. 7 H. L. 653. The English acts regulating incorporation, as do the acts in force in this state on that subject, prescribe the powers corporations organized under them may exercise, and it ought to be deemed settled law that they have only such powers as the acts under which they are created confer upon them. Atty-Gen. v. Great Northern R. Co. 1 Drew. & S. 154; Eversfield v. Mid-Sussex R. Co. 3 DeG. & J. 286; Green Bay & M. R. Co. v. Union Steamboat Co. 107 U. S. 100, 27 L. ed. 413; Thomas v. West Jersey R. Co. 101 U. S. 81, 25 L. ed. 951.

In the case last cited it was contended, as in this, that a corporation created as suggested in the questions submitted may do any act not expressly or impliedly prohibited by its charter, as might corporations at common law, but in reply to this it was said: "We do not concur in this proposition. We take the general doctrine to be, in this country, though there may be exceptional cases and some authorities to the contrary, that the powers of corporations organized under legislative statutes are such, and such only, as those statutes confer. Conceding the rule applicable to all statutes, that what is fairly implied is as much granted as what is expressed, it remains that the charter of a corporation is the measure of its powers, and that the enumeration of these powers implies the exclusion of all others." In Head v. Providence Ins. Co., 6 U. S. 2 Cranch, 127, 2 L. ed. 229, it was said: "An individual has an original capacity to contract and bind himself in such manner as he pleases. . . . But, with those bodies which have only a legal existence, it is otherwise. The act of incorporation is to them an enabling act. It gives them all the power they possess. It enables them to contract." In Davis v. Old Colony R. Co., 131 Mass. 259, 41 Am. Rep. 221, it was said that a corporation "is not vested with all the capacities of a natural person, or of an ordinary partnership, but with such, only, as its charter confers;" and it may be doubted if the English decisions assert any other rule, except as to corporations existing by prescription, whose existence, as well as powers, must be determined director in consideration of a surrender of paid-up stock are fraudulent preferences, when the insolvency of the bank was known to him at the time.

The mere fact of a stockholder's availing himself of his superior advantages to obtain security of debts due to himself to the exclusion of other creditors is held in Whitwell v. Warner, 20 Vt. 423, not to constitute a constructive fraud, which will make the stockholders individually liable for other debts of the corporation. In this case the validity of the preference itself is not directly questioned, but the question involved was the individual liability of stockholders.

In Smith v. Skeary, 47 Conn. 47, it was held that directors had a perfect right to receive payment of their debts, although the corporation was insolvent, but in that case it seems to have been supposed at the time that the corporation was able to pay all its debts.

But the great weight of authority denies the right of directors of a corporation to take advantage of their position to obtain preferences for themselves or unsecured debts. Olney v. Conant-out Land Co. 5 L. R. A. 361, 16 R. I. 597; Corey v. Wadsworth (Ala.) June 14, 1892; Gibson v. Trowbridge Furniture Co. (Ala.) June 15, 1892; Clay v. Towle, 78 Me. 36; Haywood v. Lincoln Lumber Co. 64 Wis. 639; First Nat. Bank of Stevens Point v. Knowles, 67 Wis. 373; Hays v. Citizens Bank, 51 Kan. 535; Smith v. Putman, 61 N. H. 632; Richards v. New Hampshire Ins. Co. 43 N. H. 203; Lippincott v. Shaw Carriage Co. 25 Fed. Rep. 577; Howe v. Sanford Fork & Tool Co. 44 Fed. Rep. 231; Thompson v. Huron Lumber Co. 4 Wash. 600; Coons v. Tome, 9 Fed. Rep. 532; Koehler v. Black River Falls Iron Co. 67 U. S. 2 Black, 715, 17 L. ed. 339; Gillet v. Moody, 3 N. Y. 479.

The fact that stockholders authorized a mortgage giving a preference to directors of an insolvent corporation is immaterial. Howe v. Sanford Fork & Tool Co. supra.

Thus, the president of an insolvent corporation cannot acquire a preference over other unsecured creditors by accepting on his claim bonds secured by mortgage. Sicardi v. Keystone Oil Co. 149 Pa. 145.

So acts of the directors of an insolvent corporation creating a preference in favor of a certain firm of which one of the directors was a member and was present co-operating, or consenting, or acquiescing in the transaction, cannot be upheld. Bradley v. Farwell, Holmes, 433.

Trustees of an insolvent corporation cannot sell its property to themselves, or any one of their number, nor pay off their own claims against the company in preference to those of other creditors. Third Nat. Bank of Buffalo v. Elliott, 42 Hun. 121.

A mortgage by an insolvent corporation to obtain a loan for the payment of debts may be upheld so far as the proceeds of the loan were legitimately used by the corporation, although it is invalid as to that part the proceeds which were used to pay debts on which directors were liable, thus constituting preferences to them. Corbett v. Woodward, 5 Sawy. 403.

Directors who, by executing a mortgage, secure to themselves advantages not common to all the stockholders, are held, in Koehler v. Black River Falls Iron Co. 67 U. S. 2 Black, 715, 17 L. ed. 339, to be guilty of an unauthorized act violating their trust; but in this case the invalidity of the mortgage was asserted by the corporation itself, as being in effect a fraud by the directors on other stockholders.

A preference given to the estate of a deceased director and president of an insolvent corporation by a board consisting of three directors, two of whom were brothers of the decedent and the other the agent of his estate, was held unlawful in Adams v. Kehlor Mill Co. 35 Fed. Rep. 433.

A transfer of the property of a corporation to a creditor by an officer and manager of the corporation, who is personally liable for the debt as a guarantor, indorser, or joint maker of notes, made without authority or sanction of the board of directors, is in effect a preference to him and is invalid. Goodyear Rubber Co. v. Geo. D. Scott Co. (Ala.) June 21, 1892.

Security given by an insolvent corporation for debts upon which directors are themselves liable as indorsers, being in fact a preference to them, is invalid. Consolidated Tank Line Co. v. Kansas City Varnish Co. 45 Fed. Rep. 7; Consolidated Tank Line Co. v. Kansas City Varnish Co. 43 Fed. Rep. 204.

Securities given by an insolvent corporation to a by long and uninterrupted exercise of corporate franchise. If the power thus used be for sufficient length of time as unrestricted in business as is that of a natural person, the same reason exists for presuming that a grant of such power was at some remote period made as for presuming the existence of a grant of corporate franchise from its exercise for a great number of years. It is probably true that English courts, in speaking of "corporations by the common law," refer only to those that have exercised corporate powers from time immemorial, and it may be safely assumed that no mere trading corporation was ever thus classified. Although requested to do so, if possible, counsel have been unable to furnish any decision by an English court, except the one before referred to,—which, as we have seen, was expressly overruled,—in which it was held that a corporation created under the acts of parliament regulating the formation and business of companies with corporate powers had any such powers as are here claimed for trading corporations created under the general laws of this state; and, in view of the learning and industry of counsel, we feel authorized to conclude that no such decision exists.

Whether such transactions as are set out in the questions propounded are consistent with rules recognized by courts of law as well as by courts of equity, and by them enforced for the preservation of rights and redress of wrongs, will be considered hereafter.

The broad proposition that a corporation created under the general laws of this state may do any act in reference to its property which a natural person may do with his is expressly negatived by the statute. The memorandum of association termed by the statute the "charter" is required to state "the purpose for which it is formed." Rev. Stat. art. 567. This requirement is not solely that evidence may be thus furnished that the company is one intending to pursue a business for which the statute permits incorporation, but is also intended for the protection of those who may become stockholders or creditors, who are entitled to know in what business the corporation may engage, for without this they cannot know the extent of its powers, nor the hazards to which they may be legally exposed. The statute further provides that "no corporation created under the provisions of this title shall employ its stock, means, assets or other property, directly or indi-firm of which the vice-president of the corporation, who was a member of the board of directors, was a member, constitute an unlawful preference as to other creditors not provided for. Bradley v. Converse, 4 Cliff. 375.

A deed of trust constituting an invalid preference of debts on which directors are liable is also invalid as to another debt secured thereby, where the attorney who drew the deed and advised concerning it was prosecuting the latter claim against the insolvent corporation and declined to act unless his claim was included in the deed. Consolidated Tank Line Co. v. Kansas City Varnish Co. 45 Fed. Rep. 7.

The directors of an insolvent corporation cannot, to the prejudice of any of its creditors, by mortgage upon its assets, indemnify one or more of their own body against loss as surety for the corporation upon liabilities already incurred, where such indemnity had not been agreed upon as an inducement to the incurring of such liabilities. The inability to indemnify a director in such case extends to the co-surety of a director, inasmuch as the indemnity of one would operate to the benefit of both. Lowry Bkg. Co. v. Empire Lumber Co. (Ga.) May 2, 1893.

A mortgage to indemnify a director as surety of the corporation, which constitutes as to him an invalid preference, cannot be held valid as to the creditor for whose debt the director is a surety. Being void as to both maker and mortgagee, it cannot be valid by way of subrogation in favor of the creditor. Ibid.

But security given to directors of a corporation after it became insolvent may be upheld, if given for advances by the directors made under an agreement for such securities. Stout v. Yaeger Mill Co. 18 Fed. Rep. 302.

The denial of the right of directors to obtain a preference, after knowledge of the insolvency of the corporation, is generally based on the doctrine that the assets of the corporation as soon as it becomes insolvent, constitute a trust fund, and that the directors are trustees of such fund. Roseboom v. Whittaker, 122 Ill. 81; Beach v. Miller, 130 Ill. 162; Corey v. Wadsworth (Ala.) June 14, 1892; West v. West Bradley & C. Mfg. Co. 9 N. Y. S. R. 255, and other cases above cited.

Preferences by legal proceedings.

A creditor is not precluded from obtaining an attachment against a corporation which is still doing business by the fact that he knows it to be insolvent. White P. & P. Mfg. Co. v. Pettes Importing Co. 30 Fed. Rep. 864; Breene v. Merchants & M. Bank, 11 Colo. 97.

Judgments in attachment suits do not constitute an unlawful preference against an insolvent corporation, although it was insolvent when the attachment was levied. Roseboom v. Whittaker, 122 Ill. 81.

An attachment on the property of an insolvent corporation is not invalid because of its insolvency, and the void appointment of a receiver. Jones v. Bank of Leadville, 10 Colo. 464. But see, as to directors, infra.

Merely suffering a default in an action to which there is no valid defense does not constitute an unlawful preference by an insolvent corporation. Varnum v. Hart, 119 N. Y. 101; Kingsley v. First Nat. Bank of Bath, 81 Hun. 329.

It is said in Stratton v. Allen, 16 N. J. Eq. 233, that it cannot be denied that a corporation, as well as an individual, may, independently of the statute, confess judgment in order to prefer creditors; but it was held in that case that such a preference could not be supported under the New Jersey statute. But see infra, as to judgments confessed to directors.

Judgments entered in accordance with offers of judgment by the defendant, although in actions regularly commenced by process, constitute unlawful preferences, if the defendant is a corporation known to be insolvent at the time of the offer, under the New York statute, which declares an assignment or transfer by a corporation in contemplation of insolvency void. Kingsley v. First National Bank of Bath, supra.

A judgment against an insolvent corporation obtained by its secretary on an offer of judgment in an action begun by him is held to constitute an unlawful preference, under N. Y. Rev. Stat., pt. 1, chap. 18, title 4, § 4. National Broadway Bank v. Wessell Metal Co. 59 Hun. 470.

A judgment obtained against a corporation in favor of the wife of the president of the company, who enabled her to obtain it by having a summons rectly, for any other purpose whatever, than to accomplish the objects of its creation." Rev. Stat. art. 589. The objects of its creation are none other than such as are named in the charter. A natural person may make any disposition of his property not forbidden by law, and may make any contract lawful within itself; but, under the plain terms of the statute referred to, a private corporation has no such power. The statute enumerates the powers of private corporations existing under it, and they will be here noticed. It declares that they shall have power "to hold, purchase, sell, mortgage, or otherwise convey such real and personal estate as the purposes of the corporation shall require, and also to take, hold, and convey such other property real, personal, or mixed as shall be requisite for such corporation to acquire in order to obtain or secure the payment of any indebtedness or liability due or belonging to the corporation." Rev. Stat. art. 575.

No such restrictions upon the power of natural persons to acquire, hold, or dispose of property exist; and the manifest purpose of this statute was not so much to confer power on such corporations to hold, purchase, sell, or mortgage property necessary for the proper transaction of the business named in the charter as to restrict the power of corporations to hold, buy, sell, or mortgage, subject to one exception,—to such property as may be reasonably necessary to the legitimate business of the particular corporation; for without such an express grant of power the incorporation of a company, with authority to carry on a specified business, would carry with it power to hold, purchase, sell, mortgage, or otherwise convey property necessary to that business. Power to hold, purchase, and sell property would be absolutely necessary to the business of any trading corporation, and power, through mortgage or like conveyance, to acquire means with which to purchase property necessary to carry on the business, would also exist. It will be observed that the powers mentioned in the statute are authorized to be exercised in relation to such property "as the purposes of the corporation shall require," and they are all powers ordinarily necessary to be exercised while a business is in active operation, with a view to obtain the results contemplated when a corporation is created; and the exercise of some of them, as the powers to hold and to purchase such property as the served upon himself, in order to obtain a preference over other claims while the corporation was insolvent, is invalid, if he knew of its insolvent condition. West v. West Bradley & C. Mfg. Co. 9 N. Y. S. R. 265.

A judgment obtained against an insolvent corporation by a stockholder and director, who has been made a trustee for the collection of debts owing by the corporation, which is in effect a preference for indebtedness to one who is the president and trustee of the company, amounts to an unlawful preference, under the New York statute prohibiting an assignment or transfer in contemplation of insolvency, or while insolvent. King v. Union Iron Co. 83 N. Y. S. R. 545.

A director cannot take advantage of his superior means of information to secure his debt against the corporation, either by confession of judgment or otherwise. Hill v. Pioneer Lumber Co. 31 L. R. A. 580, 113 N. C. 173.

A judgment confessed by a corporation when its insolvency was known by a judgment note in favor of a majority of its board of directors who had paid indebtedness of the corporation as guarantors, constitutes an unlawful preference as to other creditors. Roseboom v. Whittaker, 132 Ill. 81.

And directors are denied the right to get a preference by a judgment note for themselves, or as agents for others, in Atwater v. American Exch. Nat. Bank, 40 Ill. App. 501.

A judgment confessed to a director on the eve of the insolvency of a corporation was denied a preference in Stratton v. Allen, 16 N. J. Eq. 229.

So judgments taken by directors on obligations given to themselves when the corporation was insolvent, with a view to a preference, were held to be not entitled to any preference, in Hopkins App. 90 Pa. 66.

Although an officer of an insolvent corporation may bring an action against it as creditor, a levy on his judgment with a view to selling property of the corporation to pay his debt is indirectly a transfer of the property of the company for his benefit and is illegal under the New York statute, which prohibits the transfer of any of the property of an insolvent corporation to any officer, or stockholder, directly or indirectly. Kingsley v. First Nat. Bank of Bath, 31 Hun, 329.

Under N. Y. Rev. Stat., pt. 1, chap. 18, title 4, § 4, prohibiting any transfer of its property or choses in action to any officer or stockholder directly or indirectly, a director of an insolvent corporation cannot, by attachment even, although acting in distinct hostility to the other directors and officers of the company, acquire a preferential lien. Throop v. Hatch Lithographic Co. 125 N. Y. 530.

But in Iowa, following the general doctrine allowing any preference, a director may pursue his remedy against the corporation by attachment, although he knows the company is insolvent, especially where he has recently become a member of the corporation and is not responsible for its condition. Rollins v. Shaver Wagon & C. Co. 30 Iowa, 380.

This doctrine is also recognized in New York except as affected by statute. Thus the director of a foreign corporation is allowed the remedy of attachment against the corporation when insolvent on the ground that the provisions of the New York statutes as to insolvent corporations do not apply to foreign corporations. Hill v. Knickerbocker Electric Light & P. Co. 45 N. Y. S. R. 761.

On examination of the decisions it is clear that the weight of authority is overwhelmingly in favor of the legality of preferences to ordinary creditors except as restricted by statute, and overwhelmingly against the validity of such preferences when made in favor of directors. Therefore the two cases reported here with which this note is connected represent the two extremes of the doctrine and are both in conflict with the weight of authority. The Texas case, LYONS-THOMAS HARDWARE CO. v. PERRY STOVE MFG. CO., denies the validity of any preference, while the federal case, BROWN v. GRAND RAPIDS FURNITURE CO., holds (and correctly so far as the law of Michigan is concerned) that preferences even to directors are valid.

Remedies.

The assignee of an insolvent corporation cannot have relief in equity to set aside a payment by the corporation to its treasurer on the ground of trust, but may have equitable relief on the ground of his fraud. Taylor v. Taylor, 74 Me. 582.

In State v. Brockman, 39 Mo. App. 131, it is held that the payment by an insolvent corporation of a business of the corporation may require, would be necessary or permissible, looking to the rights of stockholders and creditors, only when the business was being carried on. If a corporation be created with power to manufacture cotton or woolen goods, its power to buy and hold raw material while the business was carried on would be clear. But suppose such a corporation to become insolvent, and on that account to cease business, with intent never to resume it. Would it be contended that it had power to buy and hold wool or cotton for purposes of speculation? The statute answers the question. Some of the powers mentioned, however, may be as advantageously used in winding up the affairs of a corporation as in carrying it on, and these are the powers to sell, mortgage, and otherwise convey; but it must be kept in mind that the exercise of these powers, if we look alone to the statute under consideration as their source, is authorized only in reference to such property "as the purposes of the corporation require" to be sold, mortgaged, or otherwise conveyed. If these powers stood alone, it ought to be held that they might be exercised whenever necessary or advantageous to sell, mortgage, or otherwise convey, as in winding up the affairs of a private corporation; but standing in connection, as they do, with powers relating to the same property, which can be exercised upon such property only when it is necessary to carry on the corporate business then con-debt by a transfer of property constituting a preference, although constituting a breach of trust, could not be assailed by another creditor in defense of an action brought by the purchaser based on a levy by the defendant. See also Foster v. Mullanphy Planing Mill Co., 22 Mo. 79.

Although equity may interfere to prevent unjust preferences by an insolvent corporation, an execution creditor attempting to enforce his claim to the disadvantage and exclusion of other creditors is not entitled to enforce his execution against personal property sold to another creditor in payment of a just debt of the corporation, on the ground that such sale constituted a preference, unless he can show that more property was transferred than was necessary to pay the debt at a fair valuation. Lang v. Dougherty, 74 Tex. 226.

So property purchased by a director to obtain a preference over other creditors, although subject to a trust in equity, cannot be reached by such creditors by execution. Beach v. Miller, 180 Ill. 162.

The illegality of a preference obtained against an insolvent corporation upon an offer of judgment will not render the plaintiff in that action, who enforced his execution against the property of the corporation, liable in an action at law to another creditor who is thereby prevented from obtaining satisfaction of his judgment. Braem v. Merchants Nat. Bank, 127 N. Y. 508.

The court says the proceeds of the sale on execution may properly have been made the subject of contest, and also suggests, but does not decide the question, whether an action for money had and received would lie against the creditor who had obtained the unlawful preference in favor of the creditor who had been thereby prevented from obtaining satisfaction of his judgment.

The case of Marr v. Bank of West Tennessee, 4 Coldw. 473, which is cited in numerous instances among others in the main case, as an authority on this subject, related merely to the right of judgments against an insolvent bank to priority in distribution of the assets of the bank.

That class of cases is not considered in this note. The question here considered is that of the power of a corporation to create preferences among its creditors as distinguished from any question of priorities created by law, without any intent on the part of the corporation, after it had become insolvent, to prefer one creditor over another.

English decisions.

In England the right of a corporation to prefer creditors is fully established except as restricted by statute.

In Re Wincham Ship Building, B. & S. Co., L. R. 9 Ch. Div. 322, it is declared that directors are not trustees for creditors, and that there is therefore nothing to prevent them from paying a debt of the 29 L. R. A.

company on which they are individually liable in preference to other debts, even where a judgment had already been obtained against them for the debt. In this case directors passed a resolution recommending the payment of amounts due on the shares, and in accordance therewith themselves paid the sums due on their shares to a person acting without authority for the secretary, who gave them a receipt for the money and applied it in payment of the debt of the company on which they were liable. It was held that this payment was good and relieved the directors from further liability on their shares; and that it did not constitute a fraudulent preference within the meaning of section 164 of the Company's Act of 1862, but that it was made in the ordinary course of business.

This section 164 provided in substance that any conveyance, mortgage, payment, or other act relating to property, which in the case of an individual trader would be deemed a fraudulent preference in the event of his bankruptcy, would be so regarded in the case of a corporation in the event of its being wound up.

But in Gaslight Improvement Co. v. Terrell, L. R. 10 Eq. 168, it is held that directors of an insolvent company cannot obtain a preference by an assignment of all its property in their favor, although they are pressing the company on their claims, but that such an assignment is an unlawful preference within section 164 of the Company's Act. It is said in that case that they are "trustees for creditors to this extent, that they are bound to apply all the assets for the benefit of the creditors as far as they will extend."

That section 164 applies only in case of a winding up is decided in Wilmott v. London Celluloid Co., L. R. 34 Ch. Div. 147, 56 L. J. Ch. 98, 55 L. T. N. S. 696, 35 Week. Rep. 145, holding that until a winding up petition, while the business is going on, it has no application. Therefore the application by directors of insurance money received for the destruction of property of the company to the directors' own debts was not a fraudulent preference within that section.

But the application, after a petition for winding up, of a debt due by the corporation in payment for shares held by one who had purchased the debt constitutes a fraudulent preference. Re Land Development Assn., L. R. 39 Ch. Div. 259, 57 L. J. Ch. 977, 59 L. T. N. S. 449, 35 Week. Rep. 818, 1 Meg. 69.

So in England a corporation may give security on its entire property to quiet a creditor's demands where no winding up of the company is contemplated. Re Patent File Co., L. R. 6 Ch. App. 63.

Although a preference is involved in the application to a stockholder's liability of a claim against the corporation, such set-off is a question which is not here considered.

B. A. R.

tinuing, it may be doubted if the statute under consideration has any application to the winding up of the affairs of an insolvent corporation that has ceased to do business. If by the word "purposes" be meant the business or occupation, in all its phases, which the corporation, by its charter, is empowered to pursue, as is meant by the word "purpose" in that part of the statute requiring "the purpose for which it is formed" to be stated in the charter, then it is evident that the statute has application only to powers to be used while the business for which the corporation was given existence is carried on. The power of a trading corporation to sell or to mortgage property to raise means to pay its debts during its active life, or after it has become insolvent and ceased business, is not controverted, but that is not the immediate question under consideration; for the present inquiry is, Does the statute now under consideration, as claimed, expressly or by necessary implication, confer on a corporation circumstanced as was the hardware company power to make the conveyance in question? If such a power existed, we are of opinion that it must be found elsewhere.

The statute further provides that private corporations have power "to enter into any obligation or contract essential to the transaction of its authorized business." Rev. Stat. art. 575. This statute must be considered in connection with the one just passed from, and with any other relating to the powers of private corporations, in order to understand and arrive at the legislative intent. It will be observed that this statute empowers such corporations to enter into any contract or obligation whatever, with only one restriction, which is that the contract or obligation must be essential to the transaction of the corporation's authorized business. What was the authorized business of the private corporation making the conveyance in question? That business was authorized which its charter stated it was formed to pursue. What was that business? "Business" is defined to be "that which busies, or that which occupies the time, attention, or labor of one, as his principal concern, whether for a longer or shorter time; employment; occupation." Webster. "'Business' is a word of large signification, and denotes the employment or occupation in which a person is engaged to procure a living." Goddard v. Chaffee, 2 Allen, 395, 79 Am. Dec. 796. "It is the synonym of 'employment,' signifying that which occupies the time, attention, and labor of men for the purpose of a livelihood or profit." Martin v. State, 59 Ala. 36.

The corporation making the conveyance in question was a private trading corporation, the business of which consisted in buying and selling for profit in the ordinary course of mercantile business. That was its business, within the meaning of the statute; and when that ceased, without intent to resume, the business no longer existed, and no contract thereafter made could be essential to the transaction of—the doing of—that business. The mere act of paying or securing an indebtedness can never become a business. This statute is broader than that before noticed, and evidently was intended to apply only to such contracts and obligations as it might become necessary to assume or make in carrying on the business for which incorporation was given. One applies, in terms, to power over property necessary to be held or purchased to carry on the corporate business, and to property necessary to sell, mortgage, or otherwise convey for a like purpose, while the other applies to every kind of obligation or contract necessary to be made or assumed because essential to the transaction of its authorized business.

The statute further provides that "corporations shall have power to borrow money on the credit of the corporation, not exceeding its authorized capital stock, and may execute bonds or promissory notes therefor, and may pledge the property and income of the corporation." Rev. Stat. art. 577. Was it, by this statute, intended to confer power on a corporation to borrow money, and incur its property to secure its payment, when the corporation, because of insolvency, had ceased to do business, with intent not to resume? The limitation on the sum to be borrowed, evidently based upon the presumed ability to pay to that extent, and the fact that the pledging of the income is authorized, would seem to forbid the belief that a corporation so circumstanced was contemplated by the act, for such a corporation would have no income to pledge.

These are all the provisions of the statute affecting the powers of private corporations, and it certainly is true that they do not confer upon them, in reference to corporate property, that unrestricted power a natural person has over his own. No parts of the acts of the legislature affecting private corporations, carried into the Revised Statutes or subsequently enacted, except chapter 5, title 20, Rev. Stat., seem to have application to the winding up of the business of an insolvent corporation after it has ceased to do business, with intent not to resume, nor do they undertake to declare the rights of creditors under such circumstances, but do seem to apply only to the creation, organization, powers, general management, and like matters looking to the right to carry on, and the active transaction of, the business for which incorporation is given in the particular instance; and for this reason such parts of the statute cannot be looked to in order to determine the rights of creditors, or the powers that may be exercised by the corporation under such circumstances. Such rights and powers must be determined by the general principles of law applicable to the conditions, if they be not controlled by statute.

Among other things, chapter 5, title 20, Rev. Stat., provides that "upon the dissolution of any corporation already created by or under the laws of this state, unless a receiver is appointed by some court of competent authority, the president and directors, or managers of the affairs of the corporation at the time of its dissolution, by whatever name they may be known in law, shall be trustees of the creditors and stockholders of such corporation, with full power to settle the affairs, collect the outstanding debts and divide the money and other property among the stockholders after paying the debts due and owing by such corporation at the time of its dissolution as far as such money and property will enable them; and for this purpose they may maintain or defend any judicial proceeding." Rev. Stat. art. 606. These trustees are made responsible to creditors and stockholders to the extent of property and effects that shall have come into their hands. Rev. Stat. art. 607. By "dissolution," as here used, is meant that result which follows the expiration of time limited by its charter, or the result of a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction declaring the dissolution. Rev. Stat. art. 604: The mere insolvency of a corporation, followed by cessation of business, with no intent to resume, will not operate what is technically known as "dissolution;" but it has been held in many cases, with much reason, that such condition of affairs will confer on creditors practically the same rights as they would have under technical dissolution. Slac v. Bloom, 19 Johns. 456, 10 Am. Dec. 273; Briggs v. Penniman, 8 Cow. 387, 18 Am. Dec. 454; Bank of Poughkeepsie v. Ibbotson, 24 Wend. 478; Carey v. Cincinnati & C. R. Co. 5 Iowa, 357; Moore v. Whitcomb, 48 Mo. 543; State Sav. Asso. v. Kellogg, 52 Mo. 588.

Article 606, Rev. Stat., establishes the proposition that a trusteeship exists in every case of dissolution to which it is applicable, and this necessarily fixes upon the property a trust primarily for the payment of debts; and we see no good reason, so far as creditors are concerned, why the facts shown to exist by the certificate before us should not be given the full effect technical dissolution would have. If, however, that article is to be limited in its operation, it indicates the legislative policy in such cases. This is illustrated by other legislation. Whenever a sale is made of the roadbed, track, franchise, and chartered powers and privileges of a railroad corporation, unless a receiver be appointed, the directors or managers are made trustees for the creditors and stockholders of the sold-out company, with full power to administer the unsold estate first for the benefit of creditors, and to them are responsible to the extent of property received. Rev. Stat. art. 4264. When there is a trustee clothed with such power over property, a trust, strictly, exists, which the cestui que trust may enforce. This is an instance of a trust on corporate property in behalf of creditors, where there has been no dissolution of the corporation; and this is simply because the property is no longer used, or intended to be used, for the corporate purpose for which it was originally acquired.

While the general rule is that the insolvency of a corporation will not authorize the appointment of a receiver at the suit of a creditor, so long as it is honestly carrying out the business for which it was incorporated, still such appointment may be made if the creditor's right is imperiled by a threatened misappropriation of assets; and this is upon the ground that the corporate property is a trust fund to which the creditor has the right to look for payment of the debt due him. By a recent statute the appointment of a receiver is authorized when a corporation is insolvent, or in imminent danger of insolvency, as when it has been dissolved. Sayles' Civ. Stat. art. 1461. Without considering whether there may be implied limitations to this statutory rule, it illustrates the fact that in this state mere insolvency of a corporation has been made a ground for the appointment of a receiver, doubtless for the purpose of enforcing claims against the corporate property in behalf of creditors which could not be thus enforced without recognition of the fact that the property is, at least in a limited sense, a trust fund to which creditors have the right to resort. A limited partnership, under the statutes of this state, in a respect material to the questions before us in this case, is very similar to a corporation. The special partner is liable for debts of the partnership only to the extent of the fund contributed by him to the partnership, as is the stockholder in a corporation liable only to the extent of his stock subscription; but the legislature of this state, recognizing that all creditors of such a partnership have equal claim upon the assets of such a firm when insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, has declared that "every sale, assignment, or transfer of any property or effects of the partnership when insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, or after or in contemplation of insolvency of any partner, with the intent of giving a preference to any creditor of such partnership or insolvent partner over other creditors of such partnership; and every judgment conferred, lien created or securely given by any such partnership under the like circumstances and with like intent,—shall be void as against the creditors of such partnership." Sayles' Civ. Stat. art. 8460. This statute simply gives legislative sanction to the proposition often asserted and sometimes denied, in cases of insolvent corporations, that when there is no personal liability for a debt, and the creditor must look to a fund such as the capital of a corporation, that such fund is a trust fund, if the corporation is insolvent and has ceased business, to which the creditor may resort on terms of equality with other creditors who acquired no lien prior to the time the trust character attached. This statute makes a broad application of that rule, even when there is a personal liability on the part of the general partners, on the ground that as to the special partner there is no personal liability. The succeeding article denies the right even of the general or special partner, under such circumstances, to make any sale, assignment, or other transfer of, or to create any lien on, property of the general or special partner, with intent to give a creditor of himself or of the partnership a preference over the other partnership creditors. Sayles' Civ. Stat. art. 8461.

Under the statutes in force in this state, if an insolvent corporation, in contemplation of an assignment under the statute, with intent to give preference to one creditor, should convey to him property of the corporation, this would be invalid as to other creditors, and the property would pass to the assignee under a subsequent assignment for the benefit of all creditors, unless the person so taking took under circumstances that would constitute him a bona fide purchaser, which could not well be if the corporation was insolvent, and was known to have ceased business on that account; for such knowledge, of itself, would seem sufficient to put the purchaser on inquiry. Sayles' Civ. Stat. art. 651. This statute further illustrates the fact that the property of an insolvent corporation is deemed in this state a trust fund, and emphasizes the right of all of its creditors to equality in distribution of its assets, as against all other creditors who had not acquired superior right prior to known insolvency.

In the application of principles illustrated by this statute, ought the fact that the insolvent corporation subsequently made no general assignment, and made, in effect, only mortgages conveying all of its property, as, from the papers certified by the court of civil appeals, appears to have been the case, to affect the rights of the parties? The mortgages, if sustained, would give preferences as fully as would absolute conveyances, and all of the corporate property, if not more than sufficient to pay the preferred claims, would pass from the corporation as fully as would it by subsequent assignment. These statutes have been referred to, not because any of them, in terms, declare the law applicable to the questions propounded, but because they indicate the trend of legislation on some essential matters involved in the questions, and tend to support the proposition, through analogies, that the assets of an insolvent corporation, which has ceased to carry on business, and does not intend to resume, is a fund from which all creditors not secured by valid liens existing before the condition was fixed have the right to be paid on terms of perfect equality. If such a fund be a trust fund, then the assets of a corporation so circumstanced are trust funds, and those whose right and duty it is to administer such a fund are trustees.

We have seen that such corporations as the hardware company, in England and in this state, have not the same powers in reference to property owned by them for corporate purposes as have natural persons, and that in this state there is no statute, expressly or by necessary implication, conferring on such corporations power to make preferential mortgages or like conveyances, when in the condition assumed in the questions propounded; and the question arises whether, under the general principles of law or equity applicable to such a condition, such a power exists. No English decision has been furnished in which the questions involved arose or were discussed; and it is probably true that the laws of that country in regard to insolvent corporations and persons have been such, for three centuries past, that no claim would be made in the courts of that country that such conveyances as the questions submitted refer to were valid against other creditors. We take it for granted that all English courts, under the laws of that country, would hold all such attempted preferences unauthorized and illegal, when made by an insolvent corporation circumstanced as was the hardware company, and therefore seek no further for authority from that source. It would be a useless consumption of time to review the many American decisions bearing on the questions submitted, for it must be conceded that they are clearly in conflict, and that on each side of the question may be found many decisions made by courts eminent for learning and conservatism; but reference will be made to a sufficient number on each side of the question to show the grounds on which these conflicting decisions rest.

Catlin v. Eagle Bank, 6 Conn. 283, is a leading case, and is understood to rest on substantially the same facts presented in the first question certified, except that it does not appear that there was no intention to resume the corporate business. While conceding that such corporations derive their powers solely from their charters, it was assumed that an insolvent corporation which had ceased to do business had the same power in the management and disposition of its property as had natural persons, and that for this reason the officers of such corporation might prefer creditors. It was further held that under such circumstances no trust relation existed between the managing officers of the corporation and creditors, and that no trust attached to the property of the insolvent corporation in behalf of creditors. In Dana v. Bank of United States, 5 Watts & S. 223, preference was given to named creditors through conveyance of property in trust to be sold for their benefit, when the corporation was insolvent; but it does not appear that this was done after the corporation had ceased to do business, or that this made cessation of business necessary, nor that this was contemplated. The court held that, under the principles of the common law, such corporations had certain powers enumerated, and power to do all other acts that a natural person had, unless restrained by its charter or some other act. In the course of the opinion it was said: "Although there are some restrictions placed on the bank by the act establishing it, yet it cannot be pretended, or at most cannot be shown, that the bank, or its president and directors, are either expressly or impliedly restrained from giving, directly or indirectly, preference to some of its creditors over others; and, not being restrained in this respect by this or any other act, it must be deemed to have the same power to make a distinction between its creditors, and to give preferences to some of them over others, that any natural person has." In Wilkinson v. Buuorle, 41 N. J. Eq. 696, it appeared that the directors of a corporation transferred all of its assets to one of its directors after it became insolvent. The sale was made to give preference, and this, by other creditors, was claimed to be illegal as to them, but the court said: "The correctness of this view, and the success of the contention now made, depend upon the legislation now in force respecting this subject; for if there be no legislative prohibition against the transfer of corporate property, or its use in preferring creditors after insolvency, no reason can be given why such transactions should be invalidated which would not also invalidate the like transactions of individuals." It was held in that case, however, as the purchaser was a director who took part in the transaction, that it was incumbent on him to show that he paid fair value for the property, or otherwise he should be held responsible for the difference between that and the price paid. In Pyles v. Riverside Furniture Co., 80 W. Va. 123, it was held that an insolvent corporation, having ceased to do business, has the same power as an insolvent individual to prefer a creditor in a general assignment of all its property for the payment of its debts; but it seems this decision was controlled by a statute, but for which the court would have held otherwise, as is shown in the opinion, as well as by the cases of Lamb v. Laughlin, 25 W. Va. 300, and Lamb v. Cecil, 28 W. Va. 653. In Warfield v. Marshall County Canning Co., 72 Iowa, 670, it is said, speaking in a case in which the effect of a mortgage to directors was to defeat the claims of other creditors: "The mortgagees, it is true, were officers and stockholders of the corporation; but, notwithstanding that fact, they had the right to procure the corporation to execute the mortgage, although other creditors of the corporation are unable to obtain the payment of their indebtedness. Corporations can make contracts and transfer property, possessing the same powers in such respects as private individuals. Code, § 1059. Such is the rule in the absence of a statute, and therefore it has the right to prefer one creditor to another. 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 802. The fact that the preference is exercised in favor of directors or shareholders of the corporation is immaterial, although the director or shareholder may have voted for the proposition, and the security given was to secure an indebtedness to himself." The facts of that case, it is proper to say, may not have been practically the same as those made the basis of the questions propounded, but it tends to show the grounds of decision, holding that, at all times prior to technical dissolution, corporations have power, when insolvent, to give preferences even to directors. Many other cases might be referred to, bearing on both states of fact presented in the questions propounded, but those already noticed give substantially the grounds on which rest all the opinions holding such transaction legal.

Rouse v. Merchants Nat. Bank, 46 Ohio St. 493, 5 L. R. A. 378, involved the facts presented in the first question propounded, and in that case the doctrine that corporations have the same power over corporate property as have natural persons was denied. Approving the principles announced in Wood v. Dummer, 3 Mason, 811; Sanger v. Upton, 91 U. S. 56, 23 L. ed. 220, and Curran v. Arkansas, 56 U. S. 15 How. 312, 14 L. ed. 709,—and quoting with approval from the opinion, it was held "that where a corporation for profit . . . becomes insolvent, and ceases to carry on its business, or further pursue the purposes of its creation, the corporate property constitutes a trust fund for the equal benefit of the corporate creditors, in proportion to the amounts of their respective claims, and that it cannot then, by pledge or mortgage of the property to some of its creditors as security for antecedent debts, without other consideration, create valid preferences in their behalf over the other creditors, or over an assignment thereafter made for the benefit of creditors." The case of Marr v. Bank of West Tennessee, 4 Coldw. 471, involved substantially the same facts, and therein the same rules were announced, with citation of many cases. The case of Appleton v. Turnbull, 84 Me. 72, rested on facts which made it necessary to determine the character of the assets of an insolvent corporation, and the rights of its creditors, and in the opinion it was said: "It is too firmly established at the present day to be questioned that the capital stock of a corporation is a trust fund for the payment of its debts. It is a substitute for the personal liability of the individual members of private partnerships, and those who deal with the corporation have a right to rely upon its capital stock for their security. Unpaid stock is as much a part of the assets of the corporation as the money that has been paid in upon it. . . . During the existence of the life of the corporation, it is a trust to be managed for the benefit of the stockholders; but, in the event of its dissolution or insolvency, it becomes a trust fund for the benefit of its creditors. If in such case the assets are not sufficient to pay all its debts in full, each creditor is equitably entitled to receive a ratable share of the assets which remain.

. . . In such cases the doctrine laid down by the courts for thirty years is that they must pay up their shares in full, and are entitled only to a ratable distribution of all the company's assets, and are to receive dividends upon their claims against the corporation in common with other creditors. Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 861; Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 198. The rule was settled by the Supreme Court of the United States in Sawyer v. Hoag, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 610, 21 L. ed. 731; where the court says: "The debt which the appellant owed for his stock was a trust fund devoted to the payment of all the creditors of the company. As soon as the company became insolvent, and this fact became known to the appellant, the right of set-off for an ordinary debt, to its full amount, ceased. It became a fund belonging equally, in equity, to all the creditors, and could not be appropriated by the debtor to the exclusive payment of his own claim." Scott v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 143, 152, 26 L. ed. 968, 972; Sanger v. Upton, 91 U. S. 56, 23 L. ed. 220; Stockton v. Mechanics & L. Sav. Bank, 32 N. J. Eq. 163, 167; Williams v. Traphagen, 38 N. J. Eq. 57; Wheeler v. Millar, 90 N. Y. 353. The same rule prevails in England, as may be seen in the leading decision of Grisell's Case, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 528. If the defendant's rights, as well as his duties, were to be determined by the common law alone, it is evident that the defense interposed in this case could not prevail." In Kankakee Woolen Mill Co. v. Kamps, 38 Mo. App. 229, the general questions involved in this case were considered, and after stating the general powers of a corporation while carrying on its business, and the right to protection persons obtaining preferences in good faith would be entitled to, the court said: "But these principles are only applicable to what may be termed or designated as 'going concerns.' They cannot be applied to insolvent corporations. By this we do not wish to be understood as deciding that a corporation that is financially embarrassed will be deprived of the right to deal with its corporate property in a legitimate and proper way; but we do say that when the corporation is hopelessly insolvent, and there is no reasonable or well-founded hope for a continuation of its business and these facts are known to its officers and directors, then all of the assets of the corporation become a trust fund in the hands of the directors, to be administered by them as trustees or agents for the equal benefit of all the creditors of the concern, and any attempted preference in favor of the directors themselves, or of a stranger, will not be upheld. Williams v. Jackson County Patrons of Husbandry, 28 Mo. App. 182; Roan v. Wirtz, 98 Mo. 508; Foster v. Mullanphy Planing Mill Co. 92 Mo. 79." The same reasons for denying an insolvent corporation, so circumstanced, power to give preferences, are announced with much clearness and force in the following cases: Olney v. Conanicut Land Co. 16 R. I. 597, 5 L. R. A. 361; Haywood v. Lincoln Lumber Co. 64 Wis. 639; Beach v. Miller, 130 Ill. 162; Corey v. Wadsworth (Ala.) 11 So. Rep. 350; Turnbull v. Prentiss Lumber Co. 55 Mich. 387; Adams v. Kehlor Milling Co. 35 Fed. Rep. 483; Howe v. Sanford Fork & Tool Co. 44 Fed. Rep. 231; Consolidated Tank Line Co. v. Kansas City Varnish Co. 45 Fed. Rep. 7.

The line of decisions first referred to, in substance, holds that insolvent corporations, even though they have ceased to do business, have the same power to give preferences as have natural persons, on the theory that, unless their charters forbid this, it is an implied power; but this seems indefensible under the rules applicable to the construction of charters such as may be granted to private corporations under the general laws in force in this state. The power is not expressly given, and it cannot be implied, for it is not necessary to the accomplishment of any purpose for which such corporations may be created. While such a corporation is carrying on its business, it has power to buy on credit such property as to secure such services or funds as may be reasonably necessary for the transaction of its legitimate business, and, to secure indebtedness thus incurred, may give mortgages or other security, and thus give preferences, although in fact insolvent. The exercise of such a power may often be, not only beneficial, but necessary for the continuance or prosperity of the business; but no such necessity can exist where the business has been abandoned. Self-interest, while the business is honestly carried on, will ordinarily be sufficient to prevent abuse of what is then a right; but where the business has ceased, on account of insolvency, stockholders have no further beneficial interest in the corporate assets, and 22 L. R. A.

they have no right or power, directly or through the managing officers, through preferences, in effect, to pay or secure some of the creditors at the expense of others, if the law be that the assets of an insolvent corporation, that has ceased business, with no intent ever to resume, are a fund held in trust for creditors, for in such a fund all creditors have equality of right, unless, prior to the condition which gives that, one or more have acquired right to priority.

The second class of cases to which reference has been made seems conclusively to establish the proposition that the assets of a private corporation circumstanced as was the hardware company at the time its directors attempted to give preferences are a trust fund held for the benefit of creditors,—a fund which they have the right to have converted into money, and that distributed among them ratably. The reasons for holding the assets of such an insolvent corporation to be a trust fund for the payment of its debts are set forth so clearly and fully that we will not undertake to restate them, or to give additional reasons, but will simply refer to some of the opinions giving the grounds, among which are the following: Wood v. Dummer, 3 Mason, 308; Curran v. Arkansas, 56 U. S. 15 How. 315, 14 L. ed. 710; Sanger v. Upton, 91 U. S. 60, 23 L. ed. 222; Marr v. Bank of West Tennessee, 4 Coldw. 476; Sawyer v. Hoag, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 610, 21 L. ed. 781; Morgan County v. Allen, 103 U. S. 508, 26 L. ed. 501. The subject is elaborated by elementary writers. Taylor, Priv. Corp. 654-659; Morawetz, Priv. Corp. 780-803; Wait, Insolvent Corp. 142-157; Waterman, Corp. 120-140; Cook, Stock & Stockholders, 199; Angell & A. Priv. Corp. 600-604.

Whatever technical objections may be urged in the use of the words "trust" and "trustee" in such a connection is a matter of no importance, for the substance of the matter is that the word "trust" is used to express the fact that creditors of an insolvent corporation have the right to have the specific property owned by the corporation subjected to the payment of the sums due them; and the word "trustees" is used to give expression to the fact that the directors and other managing officers of such a corporation, lawfully having possession and control of such assets, are under obligation so to apply them. If more appropriate terms be suggested, courts, no doubt, will be willing to adopt them. All of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States are understood to hold that those terms properly describe the relation between creditors of an insolvent corporation and its assets, and officers lawfully controlling them, and to give the usual effect to such relations; but it is suggested that the opinion in George F. Smith Middlings Purifier Co. v. McGrouther, 186 U. S. 241, 84 L. ed. 348, casts a doubt upon this subject, or suggests limitations that would affect the questions involved in this case. The opinion is not so understood, and it may be true that the real difficulty some courts may have had was not so much any doubt upon the question whether the assets of an insolvent corporation were a trust fund which credit.

ors had a right to have subjected to payment of sums due them, as was it on account of a doubt as to the time when, and circumstances under which, such right so attached as to cut off all power of directors, or even of stockholders, to confer upon any person, as a creditor, by way of preference, a right inconsistent with the right of all creditors to a ratable distribution of the proceeds of such assets, as against all other creditors not holding legal priorities. The cases cited in the opinion referred to will be noticed, with a view to illustrate the fact that no limitation of the general rule was intended, as well as to show when that court has understood the rule to become operative as to creditors. In case of Graham v. La Crosse & M. R. Co., 103 U. S. 148, 26 L. ed. 106, it appeared that a solvent corporation, with no fraudulent intent, disposed of lands for an inadequate consideration, and a subsequent creditor sought to apply the rule in his favor, but the court held that he could not question the transaction. The court, however, said: "When a corporation becomes insolvent, it is so far civilly dead that its property may be administered as a trust fund for the benefit of its stockholders and creditors. A court of equity, at the instance of the proper parties, will then make those funds trust funds, which, in other circumstances, are as much the absolute property of the corporation as any man's property is his." In Richardson v. Green, 133 U. S. 80, 33 L. ed. 516, it appeared that Richardson loaned a sum of money to a railroad company, and as a bonus therefor received shares of paid-up stock and bonds, and was given practical control of the board of directors; and he afterwards received other bonds as further collateral, when he proposed to make further advances, if 300 other bonds were put in his hands as collaterals. This was done, but he advanced no more money, and after the insolvency of the company he claimed to hold the bonds last mentioned and those given as further collaterals to secure the sum lent. When these things occurred, he was acting as treasurer of the company. It was held that, as between him and other creditors of the company, he could not, under the circumstances, hold them as collateral for his debt. The bonus was also held to be illegal. The court quoted with approval so much of the opinion in Graham v. La Crosse & M. R. Co. as has been inserted, and from the opinion in the case of Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Ham, 114 U. S. 587, 29 L. ed. 235, as follows: "The property of a corporation is doubtless a trust fund for the payment of its debts, in the sense that when the corporation is lawfully dissolved, and all its business wound up, or when it is insolvent, all its creditors are entitled, in equity, to have their debts paid out of the corporate property before any distribution thereof among its stockholders. It is also true, in the case of a corporation, as in that of a natural person, that any conveyance of property of the debtor without authority of law, and in fraud of existing creditors, is void as against them." And the court then said that "the principle underlying all of the decisions which we have cited upon this point is that the capital stock of a corporation, when it becomes insolvent, is, in law, assets of the corporation, to be appropriated to the payment of its debts, and that creditors have the right to assume that the stock issued by a corporation and held by its stockholders as paid-up stock had been paid up, or, if unpaid, that a court of equity, at the instance of the proper parties, could require it to be paid up."

In Fogg v. Blair, 133 U. S. 534, 33 L. ed. 721, also cited, it appeared that a railroad company, in purchasing the road and property of another company, agreed to pay a claim held by a person against the latter company, but in no way secured by lien on its property, and after the sale the holder of that claim sought to give it priority over a mortgage made by the purchasing company to secure an issue of bonds; but the court held that this could not be done, and in the course of the opinion said: "We do not question the general doctrine invoked by the appellant, that the property of a railroad is a trust fund, for the payment of its debts, but do not perceive any place for its application here. That doctrine only means that the property must first be appropriated to the payment of the debts of the company, before any portion of it can be distributed to the stockholders. It does not mean that the property is so affected by the indebtedness of the company that it cannot be sold, transferred, or mortgaged to bona fide purchasers except subject to the liability of being appropriated to pay that indebtedness." The case of Peters v. Bain, 133 U. S. 670, 33 L. ed. 696, while it asserts the general rule as to the trust character of the assets of a corporation, and the relation of directors to that and to creditors, seems to have no application to any question involved in questions submitted.

In so far as the rights of creditors of an insolvent corporation are concerned, there exists no good reason for making any distinction between unpaid subscriptions for stock and other corporate assets: for each belong to the fund from which creditors are entitled to be paid. As we have before seen, in so far as the rights of creditors are concerned, the consequences of technical dissolution occur when the corporation is in the condition set forth in the questions propounded, and in addition to the authorities cited on that point the following are now added: Graham v. La Crosse & M. R. Co. 103 U. S. 161, 26 L. ed. 111; Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Ham, 114 U. S. 587, 29 L. ed. 235; Corey v. Wade-worth (Ala.) 11 So. Rep. 353. In the case last cited, after announcing the general principles governing the assets of an insolvent corporation, the court answered a question involved in cases of that character as follows: "At what stage of a corporation's affairs must it be pronounced insolvent, so as to bring it within the principles we have declared? It is not enough that its assets are insufficient to meet all its liabilities, if it be still prosecuting its line of business, with the prospect and expectation of continuing to do so,—in other words, if it be, in good faith, what is sometimes called a 'going' business or establishment. Many successful corporate enterprises, it is believed, have passed through crises where their property and effects, if brought to present sale, would not have discharged all their liabilities in full. We feel safe in declaring that when a corporation's assets are insufficient for the payment of its debts, and it has ceased to do business, or has taken, or is in the act of taking, a step which will practically incapacitate it for conducting the corporate enterprise with reasonable prospect of success, or its embarrassments are such that early suspension and failure must ensue, then such corporation must be pronounced insolvent." The case made by the questions propounded bring it clearly within so much of the rule thus stated as may be safely adopted, and it is not now necessary to inquire whether other parts should be qualified. The condition of the corporation, set forth in the questions propounded, under the long-recognized rules of equity, conferred upon every unsecured creditor of the corporation the right to a ratable share of the proceeds of all the assets of the corporation, not subject to priorities lawfully existing when this condition arose; and we therefore answer that neither the stockholders nor directors of the insolvent corporation had lawful power, under the facts stated, to make a preferential deed of trust, whereby any creditor, whether a stockholder, director, or other officer of the corporation, or not, could acquire a preference, and that the attempted preference would be invalid as to other creditors of the corporation.

GRAND RAPIDS PARLOR FURNITURE

1. Whether chattel mortgages are void as common-law assignments giving preferences to creditors is a question of local law, upon which a federal court will follow the state decisions.
2. A federal court will follow the latest decisions of the supreme court of the state as to the validity of mortgages, although a different decision by that court was regarded as the law when the mortgages were made.
3. A change of decision as to the validity of a certain kind of mortgages made after some instruments of the kind were made whereby they are upheld does not impair the obligation of a contract between the mortgagor and a creditor who gave him credit when under the existing decisions such mortgages would be held void.
4. The fact that one of the debts secured by chattel mortgage was due at the time the mortgage was given does not nullify the defeasance clause so as to make the instrument absolute before demand and refusal to pay.
5. A resolution authorizing officers of a corporation "to secure any and all other creditors" after a person named does not require that a mortgage executed in pursuance thereof should secure all other creditors, but the word "and" has the meaning of "or."
6. A director who is a bona fide creditor of a corporation may be made a preferred creditor, where preferences to any creditors are lawful.
7. The fact that directors and stock- holders of a corporation vote to give a mortgage preferring themselves as creditors does not render it invalid.

(October 2, 1898.)

A PPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern Division of the Western District of Michigan in favor of defendant in a suit brought to set aside certain chattel mortgages given by the defendant corporations as being in fraud of other creditors. Affirmed.

Before Jackson and Taft, Circuit Judges, and Barr, District Judge.

Statement by Taft, Circuit Judge:

This was an appeal from a decree of the circuit court for the western district of Michigan, southern division. The bill was filed by Willard S. Brown, Jacob G. De Turk, and John T. Brown, citizens of the state of Pennsylvania, against the Grand Rapids Parlor Furniture Company, a corporation of Michigan, and other defendants, the beneficiaries of certain mortgages made by the furniture company to secure debts owing to them. The bill was for the purpose of setting aside these mortgages, as made by the furniture company to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors, and also as being assignments in violation of the assignment law of Michigan, and, further, as invalid because made by the directors of the furniture company to secure debts, in the payment of which the directors had a personal interest. The Grand Rapids Parlor Furniture Company had been organized in April, 1896, in the name of the Strahan & Long Furniture Company, with a NOTE.—The above case with the one preceding present the extremes of doctrine on the subject of preferences among creditors of insolvent corporations. The above case is unquestionably correct as an exposition of Michigan law, but is contrary to the overwhelming weight of authority so far as it allows preferences to directors of an insolvent corporation. The theory that such directors constitute trustees for creditors after the insolvency is 22 L. R. A.

adopted in all but a very few jurisdictions, as is shown in the note to the Texas case, preceding (LYONS-THOMAS HARDWARE CO. V. PERRY & SONS MFG. CO. ante, 802). The Texas case on the other hand goes to the other extreme and is also in conflict with the weight of authority in denying the right of an insolvent corporation to make preferences in favor of any creditors, although there is no statutory restriction on the subject.

capital stock of about $10,000. The company was organized by Harry W. Long, defendant herein, and others. Long's share of the stock was $5,000, to pay for which he borrowed money of his wife, Margaret, another defendant, to whom he gave his note for the amount. In January, 1889, the name of the company was changed to the Grand Rapids Parlor Furniture Company. The capital of the company was increased so that the paid-up capital amounted to $21,500. Harry Long presented his wife with 128 shares. She became the owner of 40 other shares, making her the holder of 168 shares. Her husband, then, was the owner of 282 shares; she held 168; W. J. Long, Jr., brother of Harry, held 189 shares; James M. Pierce, 200 shares; Harry Hubbard, 20 shares; and John E. Moore, 1 share. The Long brothers and Thomas M. Pierce were directors. At various times, Harry Long had loaned the company money, so that in March, 1891, he held its notes for $6,800. In that month, Mrs. Long, who held separate property of her own, received from her father and her uncle, and managed by J. W. Champlin, became nervous lest the ownership of the stock might subject her to a liability, under the statutes of Michigan, to the payment of labor claims against the corporation, and she therefore desired to part with her stock. Her husband purchased the stock, and paid off an obligation of his own, owing to his wife, by transferring all the notes which he held against the corporation, for $6,800. A day or two after, a bank in Grand Rapids having refused to renew a note of the company for $3,000, upon which Harry Long was indorser, Mrs. Long was induced to give to the company some street-railway stock which she owned, valued at $8,000, to enable the company to renew the notes with the collateral, and, further, to agree to let the company have $1,000 additional when needed, on condition that it would give her security, whenever she might demand it, for the entire debt, including the $6,800 as well as the new loans. At a stockholders' meeting a resolution was passed, authorizing the directors to comply with this condition, and the $3,000 of street-railway stock was delivered in March, 1891. The other $1,000 was never called for. In July, 1891, the company was asked to pay a $1,000 note held by Clara M. Pierce, wife of Thomas M. Pierce, one of the directors. Legal proceedings were threatened, to collect the note. The company had no money to pay it. Harry Long notified his wife, who was at Mackinac, that she ought to demand security, and she at once made such demand. Judge Champlin, also, was advised, and he superintended the obtaining of the security. The mortgage was drawn by Moore & Wilson, and covered all the merchandise and assets of the company, with the exception of the bills receivable. On the same day, somewhat later, Harry Long directed Moore & Wilson to make a mortgage to Charles M. Wilson, trustee, to secure labor debts; a note to the Fifth National Bank for $1,000; a note to the Fourth National Bank for $5,000; Clara M. Pierce, $1,000; Asa Denison, $1,000; Northwestern Trimming Company, $383; J. V.

Farwell Company, $307; W. and J. Sloan, $667. Harry Long was indorser on the notes for $6,800 held by his wife, and also upon the notes held by the Fifth and Fourth National Banks; and upon those held by Denison, the Northwestern Trimming Company, J. V. Farwell Company, and by Sloans. W. J. Long was indorser on the paper at the Fourth National Bank. All the stockholders, as has been already stated, were personally liable for the labor debts. The two mortgages were executed July 18, and were filed July 20; the one at 9:25 A. M., and the other at 9:28 A. M. July 21. Judge Champlin, as the agent for Mrs. Long, and Wilson, as the trustee for the creditors named in the mortgage to him, took possession, jointly. On the 28th of July the complainants filed this bill on behalf of themselves, and other creditors similarly situated. Wilson, the trustee, was appointed receiver, and has brought into court $21,500 as the fund realized from the assets of the defunct corporation. The debts of the corporation amount to about $37,000. If both mortgages are sustained as valid, they will more than consume the assets of the corporation. The circuit court held that the mortgages were valid, and entered a decree dismissing the bill.

Messrs. Edward Taggart and Arthur C. Denison, for appellants:

When the corporation becomes insolvent the stockholders cease to have any real interest, and the creditors become the actual beneficiaries. From that time on they are the real parties in interest, and it must be their privilege to avoid any irregular or unauthorized action by those in nominal charge of the assets. The election to avoid always rests with the principal, the beneficiary; and in this corporation the creditors, not the stockholders, occupy that position.

Hoyt v. Thompson, 5 N. Y. 332; Despatch Line of Packets v. Bellamy Mfg. Co. 12 N. H. 205, 37 Am. Dec. 203; Wiggin v. First Freewill Baptist Church in Lowell, 8 Met. 301; Sweeney v. Sugar Ref. Co. 80 W. Va. 443; Lingle v. National Ins. Co. 45 Mo. 109; Thomas v. Brownville, Ft. K. & P. R. Co. 109 U. S. 522, 27 L. ed. 1018; Twin Lic. Oil Co. of West Virginia v. Marbury, 91 U. S. 587, 23 L. ed. 328.

The mortgages were, in fact, a secret lien, and invalid as such.

Smith v. Craft, 12 Fed. Rep. 861; Gill v. Griffith, 2 Md. Ch. 270; Blennerhassett v. Sherman, 105 U. S. 117, 26 L. ed. 1085.

The mortgages amounted to an assignment for the benefit of creditors, and, as preferences, were invalid.

1. The company was insolvent, and the business to be wound up.
2. The two mortgages were one transaction.
3. They covered all its property.
4. They were to a trustee for the benefit of creditors, with preferences.

The making of such conveyances as these has often been said to be a declaration of insolvency.

Two tests are given in the books. One is the ability to pay current debts as they become due.

Dutcher v. Wright, 94 U. S. 557, 24 L. ed. 181.

The other test is the comparative amounts of assets and liabilities.

Burrill on Assignments, 5th ed. § 2, defines voluntary assignments for the benefit of creditors as "transfers without compulsion of law, by debtors, of some or all of their property to an assignee or assignees in trust, to apply the same, or the proceeds thereof, to the payment of some or all of their debts."

The mortgage to Mrs. Long was a part of the same transaction with the trust mortgage, and the trust mortgage would never have been suspected to be anything but an assignment, except that it was marked "mortgage" on the back and contained a defeasance clause.

Danner v. Brewer, 69 Ala. 191; Watts v. Bufaula Nat. Bank, 76 Ala. 474; Ordway v. White, 80 Ala. 244; Winner v. Hoyt, 66 Wis. 227, 57 Am. Rep. 257; Bonns v. Carter, 23 Neb. 495; Wilks v. Walker, 22 S. C. 108, 53 Am. Rep. 706; Austin v. Morris, 23 S. C. 393; Harkrader v. Leiby, 4 Ohio St. 602; Dickson v. Rawson, 5 Ohio St. 218; Straw v. Jenks, 6 Dak. 414; Penzel Co. v. Jelt, 54 Ark. 428; Maxwell v. Simonton, 81 Wis. 635; Marshall v. Livingston Nat. Bank, 11 Mont. 351.

The question of what is an assignment, irrespective of any state statute, is one of general commercial law, and the Supreme Court of the United States has expressed a controlling opinion.

White v. Cotzhausen, 129 U. S. 329, 33 L. ed. 877.

Howell's Statutes, § 8739, says: "All assignments commonly called common-law assignments for the benefit of creditors shall be void, unless the same shall be without preferences, etc."

Although an instrument having a defeasance clause cannot, as matter of law, be said to be an assignment.

If facts appear outside of the instrument itself which tend to prove that the instrument was made with the intention of having the effect of a common-law assignment or with the intention of evading the statute, then it becomes a question of fact for the jury.

Warner v. Littlefield, 89 Mich. 329; Fitzgerald v. McCandlish, Id. 400.

There are several important features in the trust mortgage to Mr. Wilson which bear on the intent and serve to distinguish it from Warner v. Littlefield, supra.

1. The mortgage gave to the trustee the immediate right of possession.

Daggett v. McClintock, 56 Mich. 54; Eggleston v. Mundy, 4 Mich. 295.

2. It gave the power of private sale, full, perfect, and complete, to be instantly exercised, without any notice to anybody.

3. The so-called defeasance clause is made of no effect by the insecurity clause. The mortgagee may foreclose and sell at any moment.

4. It was intended to and did operate to end the company's business.

5. The mortgagor selected his own attorney as trustee.

6. In case of default, it was the duty, not the privilege, of the trustee to sell.

7. There was no defeasance. The condition was, "if the party of the first part shall pay or cause to be paid the debts above mentioned, 23 L. R. A.

at maturity, then this instrument shall be void, etc. One of these notes was to Clara M. Pierce, and was then three weeks past maturity, and the threat of its possible collection was the cause of the collapse.

The state rule is not obligatory upon this court.

If the Michigan rule is to be followed, it must be that rule in force when the contract was made.

The rule in the federal courts was settled at the time the rights here involved accrued that an insolvent debtor could not make a preferential assignment in the form of a mortgage.

Dwight v. Scranton & W. Lumber Co. 82 Mich. 624.

The rule in the state courts was also settled, and to the same effect.

The rule in the state court, if not so settled, was at least not definitely fixed against us, but was uncertain.

The mortgages were invalid as being an attempt, by the managers of an insolvent corporation, to secure the debts upon which they were personally liable, to the exclusion of other creditors.

Mr. John E. More, for defendant Long, and Messrs. Kingsley & Kleinhaus, for defendant Wilson, appellees:

Under the law of Michigan, an insolvent debtor may pay or secure one or more of his creditors in preference to others.

Sheldon v. Mann, 85 Mich. 285; Warner v. Littlefield, 89 Mich. 329; Olmstead v. Mottison, 45 Mich. 617; Heineman v. Hart, 55 Mich. 76; Sweetzer v. Higby, 63 Mich. 13; Fieid v. Fisher, 65 Mich. 606; Whipple v. Stebbins, 67 Mich. 507.

The question of the construction and effect of a statute of a state regulating assignments for the benefit of creditors, is a question upon which the decisions of the highest court of the state, establishing a rule of property, are of controlling authority in the courts of the United States.

South Branch Lumber Co. v. Ott, 142 U. S. 622, 35 L. ed. 1137.

The statute of Michigan relating to assignments provides that "all assignments, commonly called common-law assignments for the benefit of creditors, shall be void unless the same shall be without preferences between such creditors, etc."

Rollins v. Van Baalen, 56 Mich. 610, referring to this statute, says: "It should be construed as it reads, as applying only to what purport to be common-law assignments."

Prior to Kendall v. Bishop, 76 Mich. 634, it had been held in a number of cases that where an assignment had been in fact made and preferences had been given by way of mortgages immediately preceding the making of the assignment, the mortgages might, under certain circumstances, be treated as part and parcel of the assignment and therefore void under the statute; but in no case had the court so held, except where an instrument which on its face purported to be an assignment, had been in fact given. In Kendall v. Bishop a mortgage was made by a corporation to a trustee to secure certain indebtedness and contained some clauses which are not contained in an ordinary form of a chattel mortgage. Justice Campbell, delivering the opinion of the court, held this instrument to be a general assignment, basing his determination upon differences between that instrument and an ordinary chattel mortgage.

See also Atkinson v. Weidner, 79 Mich. 575.

The decision of Kendall v. Bishop was a surprise to the profession, and in direct conflict with the former decisions of the court. It was a mistake of law which the court soon set about correcting.

Sheldon v. Mann, 85 Mich. 285; Bresnon v. Musselman, 86 Mich. 186; Warner v. Littlefield, 89 Mich. 329; Fitzgerald v. McCandlish, Id. 400; Bank of Montreal v. The J. E. Potts Salt & Lumber Co. 90 Mich. 345; Weber v. Childs, 90 Mich. 498; Warren v. Dwyer, 91 Mich. 414.

The position of the court now is that an instrument in form a mortgage cannot be held to be a general assignment.

It is contended that, inasmuch as the bill in this case was filed while Kendall v. Bishop and Atkinson v. Weidner, supra, stood as the latest exposition of the assignment law by the supreme court of Michigan, the doctrine therein announced should control in the determination of this case, instead of that announced in the later cases.

Defendants insisted that the court should follow the late cases, which have, in fact, overruled Kendall v. Bishop.

Leflingwell v. Warren, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 599, 17 L. ed. 261.

It was further urged that whether the mortgages in this case amounted to a general assignment or not, they were void for the reason that they were given by an insolvent corporation to certain of its creditors, while other creditors got nothing. This contention was based upon what is known as the "trust fund" theory, viz.: that the assets of an insolvent corporation are a trust fund which must be ratably distributed amongst all its creditors.

The trust fund theory does not prevail in Michigan.

Town v. Bank of River Raisin, 9 Dougl. (Mich.) 530; Turnbull v. Prentiss Lumber Co. 55 Mich. 396; Kendall v. Bishop, and Bank of Montreal v. The J. E. Potts Salt & Lumber Co. supra.

The mortgages in this case are not bad because given by an insolvent corporation to secure some of its debts for which its directors are liable.

Twin-Lick Oil Co. of West Virginia v. Marbury, 91 U. S. 587, 23 L. ed. 323; Green v. Chicago, S. & C. R. Co. reported under the name of Richardson v. Green, 133 U. S. 30, 33 L. ed. 516; Hills v. Stockwell & D. Furniture Co. 23 Fed. Rep. 432; Taylor County Ct. v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 35 Fed. Rep. 161; Combination Trust Co. v. Weed, 2 Fed. Rep. 24; Gould v. Little Rock, M. R. & T. R. Co. 53 Fed. Rep. 690.

In Michigan it is lawful for an insolvent corporation to prefer a stockholder or director.

Bank of Montreal v. The J. E. Potts Salt & Lumber Co., and Kendall v. Bishop, supra.

It was urged that the question here involved was the relation of a corporation to its directors and their respective rights and duties, and was, therefore, a question of general law, upon which the courts of the United States were at liberty to adopt their own rule of decision, regardless of the rule adopted by the highest court of the state. This contention cannot prevail.

Etheridge v. Sperry, 189 U. S. 266, 85 L. ed. 171; Claiborne County v. Brooks, 111 U. S. 400, 28 L. ed. 470; Detroit v. Osborne, 185 U. S. 492, 84 L. ed. 280; Allen v. Fairbanks, 45 Fed. Rep. 445, 85 Cent. L. J. 822.

It is now held with practical unanimity by all the courts that an insolvent corporation like an individual may prefer its creditors, in the absence of any statutory prohibition. It is also held with like unanimity in the later cases that a corporation may deal with its directors. If these two propositions be conceded to be law, it seems impossible to evade the conclusion that an insolvent corporation may prefer a director.

Bergen v. Porpoise Fishing Co. 43 N. J. Eq. 397; Stratton v. Allen, 16 N. J. Eq. 238; Central R. & Bkg. Co. of Georgia v. Claghorn, 1 Speers, Eq. 545; Planters Bank of Farmville v. Whittle, 78 Va. 737; Buell v. Buckingham, 16 Iowa, 284, 85 Am. Dec. 516; Hallam v. Indianola Hotel Co. 56 Iowa, 179; Whitwell v. Warner, 20 Vt. 444; Callin v. Eagle Bank of New Haven, 6 Conn. 233; Smith v. Skeary, 47 Conn. 47; Ashhurst's App. 60 Pa. 290; Gordon v. Preston, 1 Watts, 885, 26 Am. Dec. 75; Duncomb v. New York, H. & N. R. Co. 84 N. Y. 190.

The following cases support the contention that an insolvent corporation cannot prefer its directors:

Stout v. Yaeger Milling Co. 18 Fed. Rep. 802; Lippincott v. Shaw Carriage Co. 25 Fed. Rep. 577; Coons v. Tome, 9 Fed. Rep. 532; Corbett v. Woodward, 5 Sawy. 408; Bradley v. Converse, 4 Cliff. 879; Bradley v. Farwell, Holmes, 433; Adams v. Kehler Milling Co. 35 Fed. Rep. 438; House v. Sanford Fork & Tool Co. 44 Fed. Rep. 231; Consolidated Tank Line Co. v. Kansas City Varnish Co. 45 Fed. Rep. 7; Haywood v. Lincoln Lumber Co. 64 Wis. 688; Beach v. Miller (Ill.) Jan. 19, 1888.

In all these cases will be found a misapplication of the trust-fund principle.

Taft, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

It is not contended on behalf of the complainants that the debts which the mortgages in question were given to secure are not valid debts of the company, with the exception of the note held by Clara M. Pierce for $1,000. Whether the Pierce note is a valid obligation is not material on this issue, because the other secured debts, if the mortgages are held valid, are more than enough to consume the fund in court. There is no charge of actual bad faith made with reference to the giving of these mortgages. The contention of the complainants is that these mortgages should be held to be invalid—First, because they are, in effect, common-law assignments, with preferences, as between creditors, and are therefore void under the Statute of Michigan (2 How. Stat. § 8739) which provides that "all assignments commonly called common-law assignments for the benefit of creditors shall be void unless the same shall be without preference as between such creditors, and shall be of all property of the assignor not exempt from execution;" second, because the mortgages were given by an insolvent corporation to secure debts in which the stockholders and directors, whose votes made the mortgages the act of the corporation, had a personal interest in them, as grantors thereof.

1. The question whether these chattel mortgages are void, as common-law assignments giving preference to creditors, under the statute of Michigan, is a question purely of local law. This is expressly decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Etheridge v. Sperry, 189 U. S. 266, 85 L. ed. 171. Mr. Justice Brewer, speaking for the court, said in that case:

"While chattel mortgages are instruments of general use, each state has a right to determine for itself under what circumstances they may be executed, the extent of the rights conferred thereby, and the conditions of their validity. They are instruments for the transfer of property, and the rules concerning the transfer of property are, primarily, at least, a matter of state regulation. We are aware that there is a great diversity in the ruling on this question by the courts of the several states; but, whatever may be our individual views as to what the law ought to be in respect thereto, there is so much of a local nature entering into chattel mortgages that this court will accept the settled law of each state as decisive in respect to any case arising therein."

There can be no doubt that, under the decisions of the supreme court of Michigan, the mortgages in question here are not violations of the statute forbidding preferences in common-law assignments. It is said that at the time these mortgages were executed, under the then last decision of the supreme court of Michigan, in Kendall v. Bishop, 76 Mich. 634, these mortgages would have been invalid, and that the law of the state, which this court should follow with respect to the mortgages, is the law which was in force as then expounded by the supreme court. Conceding, for the purposes of the argument, that under the case of Kendall v. Bishop, supra, these mortgages must be held invalid, we are of opinion that, if subsequent decisions of the supreme court have reversed the principle announced in that case, we should follow those subsequent decisions. The right of the complainants and their general creditors to take the mortgages was a remedy, and not a contractual right; and there is nothing in this case to show, or justify a presumption, that the debts represented by the complainants and other unsecured general creditors were contracted on the faith of the inability of the corporation to prefer creditors by chattel mortgage. Certainly, it would not impair their contracts of indebtedness if the legislature of Michigan had repealed the statute making common-law assignments with preferences void. If so, the law of the state of Michigan, which we are to administer, is the law of the state, as expounded by its highest tribunal, when the remedy comes to us for our enforcement. It was decided in Warner v. Littlefield that a debtor, though insolvent, might secure a creditor, for the payment of a pre-existing debt, by a mortgage upon all his property, although he should have numerous creditors who were unsecured, and that neither the fact of the debtor's insolvency, nor the knowledge of the creditor of that fact, would defeat or impair a mortgage security taken for an honest debt; that the fact that the mortgagee was not the creditor of the mortgagor, and that the mortgage was executed in trust to secure certain specified creditors the amounts of their several claims, did not tend, in any degree, to give the instrument the character of a common-law assignment; that if the instrument was a conveyance given upon condition, as a security for a pre-existing debt, and contained no trust in its body, whereby the property was withdrawn from the right of the mortgagor or others to redeem, who ordinarily have such right in cases of chattel mortgages, or whereby the title of the property was placed beyond the reach of execution as to any surplus, then the instrument was a chattel mortgage, but if it conveyed the absolute title to a trustee for the benefit of creditors, and thus placed the property and surplus beyond the reach of creditors, it was a common-law assignment; that the question whether the instrument was a chattel mortgage, or an assignment for the benefit of creditors, must in all cases be determined as a question of law, upon the contents of such instrument, and not from any outside testimony; and that unless the conveyance, upon its face, purported to convey all of the debtor's property to secure certain preferred creditors, by an absolute title, the court was not at liberty to declare it a common-law assignment. The case of Warner v. Littlefield, 89 Mich. 829, only followed the case of Sheldon v. Mann, 85 Mich. 265, and was followed by the supreme court in Bank of Montreal v. The J. E. Potts Salt & Lumber Co., 90 Mich. 845. It is not disputed that the mortgages in this case have the ordinary form of a chattel mortgage under the statutes of Michigan. They have the defeasance clause, and the necessary legal import of their language is that the absolute title does not pass to the person named as mortgagee, but only a title on condition; leaving in the mortgagor the right to redeem the same, and in the general creditors the right to levy upon the equity of redemption. Reliance is had on the fact that one of the notes under the second mortgage was due at the time the mortgage was given. The language of the defeasance clause of that mortgage was as follows: "To have and to hold the same forever; provided, always, and the condition of these presents is such, that if the said party of the first part shall pay or cause to be paid, the debts above mentioned, with interest thereon, at maturity, then this instrument and said notes shall be void and of no effect, and said party of the first part agrees to pay the same accordingly."

We do not think the defeasance clause is rendered null and void by reason of the fact that one of the debts secured by the mortgage was due at the time the mortgage was given. The sensible construction of the defeasance clause would seem to be that the mortgage would not become absolute until after demand for the payment of the note subsequent to the giving of the mortgage and a refusal to pay. Reliance is had by the complainants on certain language of the supreme court of Michigan in the case of Warner v. Littlefield, already referred to, as follows: "The question as to whether the instrument is a chattel mortgage, or an assignment for the benefit of creditors, must, in all cases, be determined as a question of law upon the contents of such instrument, and not upon any testimony which appears outside of such instrument; and unless the conveyance, upon its face, purports to convey all of the debtor's property to secure some creditors, in preference to others, by an absolute title, the court is not at liberty to declare it a common-law assignment; and if the facts appear outside of the instrument itself, and tend to prove that the instrument was made with the intention of having the effect of a common-law assignment, or with the intention of evading the statute, then it becomes a question of fact, for the jury to decide, and not for the court."

It is said here that the facts dehors the instrument show that it was intended by the parties to be a common-law assignment, though on its face it was only a chattel mortgage. That the effect of a mortgage which conveys all the property of an insolvent debtor to a trustee, with power to sell, and distribute the proceeds among the preferred creditors, whose claims exceed the value of the property conveyed, is practically the same as a common-law assignment, was, of course, obvious to the court rendering the above opinion. It cannot, therefore, be construed to mean that because a chattel mortgage has the effect of a common-law assignment, in that it disposes of all the property of the debtor, with preference to certain creditors, the debtor himself intended a common-law assignment. It may be a little difficult to say what distinction the court did have in mind, in the above language. It was probably referring to a case where there is some secret agreement between the debtor and the mortgage creditors, dispensing with the obligation of the defeasance clause, so that the mortgage, on its face, does not express the real agreement between the parties. There is nothing in this case to show that the mortgage was not a bona fide attempt to secure pre-existing indebtedness. Its effect, in view of the impossibility and improbability that the corporation could ever redeem the property, was necessarily to transfer the property to a trustee, who should sell it, and distribute the proceeds as an assignee under a common-law assignment would. But it is not shown, and we cannot infer, that, if the corporation or any attaching creditor had seen fit to redeem the property by paying the debts secured by the mortgage, there would have been resistance on the part of any secured creditors to an enforcement of this right secured by the mortgage. We are very clear, under the cases cited, that in Michigan the mortgages are valid.

Objection is made that the mortgages were not authorized by the directors and stockholders, as given. It seems to us that they are quite within the resolution passed by the stockholders. The recital in the resolution made the consideration for giving the mortgage the advancing of the additional $3,000 by Mrs. Long, to assist the corporation, and the agreement to advance $1,000 more, when required. The other $1,000 was not required by any one connected with the corporation, and it cannot be said, therefore, that she did not comply with her full contract, entitling her to the mortgage. The resolution authorized the secretary and treasurer to secure any and all other creditors by mortgages subject to, and subsequent to, the mortgage to Mrs. Long. It is said that this required a mortgage which should secure all other creditors. We do not think so. It was evidently the intention to give the right to secure any other creditors, the word "and" having the meaning of "or," in that connection.

2. We now come to the question whether the fact that Harry and W. J. Long, directors, were interested as guarantors and indorsers upon most of the notes secured by the mortgages, and were directors and stockholders in the corporation, and as such voted to give the mortgages, renders the mortgages invalid. The question has been directly decided by the supreme court of Michigan against the contention of the complainants. In the case of Bank of Montreal v. The J. E. Potts Salt & Lumber Co., 90 Mich. 345, mortgages which secured directors, given by an insolvent corporation, were held to be valid. Said the supreme court (Montgomery, J.): "Nor is the law of this state that, as soon as a corporation becomes insolvent, the directors of the corporation become trustees for all the creditors alike, in such sense as to prevent their giving valid security by way of preference to one of the directors or stockholders. We are aware that the decisions of the various states are not uniform as to this question, and that a number of very eminent text-writers have deprecated a state of the law which admits of such preferences. But, to adopt the language of Dillon, J., in Buell v. Buckingham, 16 Iowa, 284, 85 Am. Dec. 516, this condition of the law 'may constitute a good legislative reason for giving priority to outside creditors, but the legislature must furnish the remedy.' In the case referred to, it was held that being an officer of the corporation did not deprive Buell of the right to enter into competition with other creditors and run a race of diligence with them. See also, Hallam v. Indianola Hotel Co. 56 Iowa, 179; Garrett v. Burlington Plow Co. 70 Iowa, 697, 59 Am. Rep. 461; Smith v. Skeary, 47 Conn. 54; *Callin v. L. ed. 328; Wilkinson v. Bauerle, 41 N. J. Eq. 685."

To the cases cited in the above opinion may be also added Hills v. Stockwell & D. Furniture Co. 28 Fed. Rep. 482; Taylor County Ct. v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 35 Fed. Rep. 161; Gould v. Little Rock, M. R. & T. R. Co. 52 Fed. Rep. 680; Stratton v. Allen, 16 N. J. Eq. 233; Duncomb v. New York & H. R. Co. 84 N. Y. 190.

Several cases have been cited, some of them decisions of circuit courts of the United States, in which it has been held that, while it is lawful for a corporation to prefer creditors, it is not equitable or permissible for directors of a corporation to prefer themselves, even if they are bona fide creditors, because they are trustees. It may be conceded that the trust relation justifies and requires courts of equity to subject preferences by an insolvent corporation of its own directors to the closest scrutiny, and places the burden upon the preferred director of showing, beyond question, that he had a bona fide debt against the corporation; but we do not see why, if a corporation may prefer one creditor over others, it may not prefer a director who is a bona fide creditor. Preferences are not based on any equitable principle. They go by favor, and as an individual may prefer, among his creditors, his friends and relatives, so a corporation may prefer its friends.

There are, as has been said, several decisions in the federal courts upholding the opposite doctrine, but no such decision has been rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States. The Supreme Court of the United States, in several cases, has held that the subscriptions of its stockholders are a trust fund for the payment of its creditors, in so far that the corporation may not release stockholders from payment thereof (Scott v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 143, 26 L. ed. 969); but it has as yet not announced the doctrine that the assets of a corporation are a trust fund for equal distribution among its creditors. For a full review of the cases, see the opinion of Mr. Justice Brewer in Hollins v. Brierfield Coal & Iron Co., 150 U. S. 371, 37 L. ed. 1113 (decided by the Supreme Court of the United States November 20, 1893). That court has not announced the doctrine that a corporation may not prefer one of its creditors, and it has not announced the doctrine that a corporation may not prefer as a creditor one of its directors. In the case of The George T. Smith Middlings Purifier Co. v. McGroarty, 136 U. S. 237, 34 L. ed. 346, the Supreme Court of the United States followed the supreme court of Ohio in holding that the assets of an insolvent corporation were a trust fund for equal distribution among its creditors; but they did so expressly on the ground that this was the decision of the supreme court of Ohio, founded on the constitution and statute law of that state with reference to corporations. The opinion of Mr. Justice Gray contains a very broad intimation that there is no general equitable principle requiring such equal distribution among the creditors of the corporation. All the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States relied on and referred to as sustaining the view that the bona lide debt of a director of a corporation may not be paid in preference to the debt of some other creditor are cases where the directors were guilty of fraud in procuring the payment of their own debts by fraudulent wasting of the assets to accomplish the preference. Such were the cases of Drury v. Milwaukee & S. R. Co. 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 299, 19 L. ed. 40; Koehler v. Black River Falls Iron Co. 67 U. S. 2 Black, 715, 17 L. ed. 839; Jackson v. Ludeling, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 616, 23 L. ed. 402. There is no such element in this case.

It has been argued that upon this question the court should reach a conclusion as upon a doctrine of general law, and not be governed by the decisions of the supreme court of Michigan. Whether this be true or not, it is the duty of the court, where the matter is one of doubt, to lean towards the decision of the state court.

The decree of the court below is affirmed, at the costs of the appellants.

VERMONT SUPREME COURT.

Road supervisors are public officers and not mere agents of the county commissioners. Anne Arundel County Comrs. v. Duvall, 54 Md. 360, 39 Am. Rep. 396.

Highway surveyors are public officers, whose duties and authority are prescribed by statute, and are not by statute agents of their towns. White v. Philipston, 10 Met. 108; Walcott v. Swampscott, 1 Allen, 101; Barney v. Lowell, 98 Mass. 570.

In Bates v. Rutland, 9 L. R. A. 368, 65 Vt. 178 street commissioners were held public officers and not agents or servants of the municipality.

Their powers and duties being prescribed by statute are independent of the town, and cannot be directed, controlled, or removed by the town, and the officers are not amenable to the town for the manner in which they discharge the trust reposed in them by law, nor can the town exercise any right of selecting the servants or agents by whom surveyors shall perform their work. Walcott v. Swampscott, supra; Waldron v. Haverhill, 143 Mass. 582.

Highway commissioners are a quasi corporation, and suit by or against them should be brought in their official and not in their individual names. Lang v. Soffell, 33 Ill. App. 624; Rutland Highway Comrs. v. Dayton Highway Comrs. 60 Ill. 53.

No execution should issue against highway commissioners, they being a municipal corporation. 23 L. R. A.

Lange v. Soffell, supra; Kansas v. Juntgen, 84 Ill. 360.

2. Capacity in which liable.

As public officers acting for the public alone, they are exempt from personal liability, but if engaged in special employment with duties of a more private character concerning individuals, as well as the public, they are liable to private actions. Robinson v. Rohr, 2 L. R. A. 365, 73 Wis. 436.

They must act as independent public officers, and not as the agents of the corporation. Conrad v. Ithaca Village Trustees, 16 N. Y. 158; Hickok v. Plattsburgh Village Trustees, reported in note, 16 N. Y. 158.

The responsibility for repairs in highways in general rests upon the officers individually having charge thereof, and not upon the townships. Leon Twp. v. Taylor, 20 Mich. 153; Marathon Twp. v. Oregon Twp. 8 Mich. 379.

The civil remedy for misconduct in office is restricted, and depends exclusively upon the nature of the duty which has been violated. Wilson v. New York, 1 Denio, 695, 43 Am. Dec. 719.

3. Duties required of them.

Commissioners of highways are charged with the duty of acting with vigilance and watchfulness in ascertaining the condition of the highways, and they must exercise proper care in their maintenance in a reasonably safe condition for all ordinary travel. Embler v. Walkill, 57 Hun, 384.

A reasonable degree of watchfulness in ascertaining the condition of their roads and preventing their dilapidation is all that is required by law of highway commissioners. Hicks v. Chaffee, 12 Hun, 293, where an inspection of a bridge failed to disclose a defect, which nothing but the total removal of the bridge could have shown.

To the same effect, Barton v. Syracuse, 36 N. Y. 57; McCarthy v. Syracuse, 46 N. Y. 194; Hover v. Barkhoof, 44 N. Y. 113; Bostwick v. Barlow, 14 Hun, 177.

Such degree of watchfulness extends to ascertaining the condition of the structure from time to time and preventing the same from becoming dilapidated or obstructed. McCarthy v. Syracuse, 46 N. Y. 196.

They must, with reasonable care and fidelity, discharge the duties they have solemnly sworn to perform. Hover v. Barkhoof, supra.

They are bound to make repairs and remove obstructions interrupting and impeding traffic. Griffith v. Follett, 20 Barb. 630.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Rutland County Court in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Surveyors of highways have a right to remove soil or gravel from one part of the highway to another, for the making of a public road and for the repair of the same, so as to make it safe and convenient for public travel without liability to the owner of the soil. Denniston v. Clark, 125 Mass. 216; Adams v. Emerson, 6 Pick. 53; Phillips v. Bowlers, 7 Gray, 21; Burr v. Leicester, 121 Mass. 241; Jackson v. Hathaway, 15 Johns. 447, 8 Am. Dec. 263; *Fish v. In Hovey v. Mayo, 43 Me. 323, the right was extended to the removal of soil from one highway to another within their jurisdiction.

If the authority of a public officer to act is defined by statute, all who contract with him will be presumed to know the extent of his authority and cannot allege ignorance as a ground for charging him with excessive duty or authority, unless such officer knowingly mislead the other party. Newman v. Sylvester, 42 Ind. 106.

A commissioner obeying the demands of a valid statute is not liable in damages for the error of assessors. Hampton v. Hamsher, 35 N. Y. S. R. 341.

They have no authority, excepting as to highways and roads upon land. Austin v. Carter, 1 Mass. 281.

The duty imposed upon such officers should be a personal one, and not only one which he is under obligation, but clothed with ability, to perform both in the means furnished to him and the legal authority to act irrespective of superior officers. Nowell v. Wright, 3 Allen, 106, 30 Am. Dec. 62.

The General Statutes of Massachusetts, chap. 44, § 8, give surveyors of highways authority to remove obstructions such as buildings upon a highway. Morrison v. Howe, Morrison v. Clemence, 120 Mass. 565.

In an action of trespass against the commissioners of a highway for the alteration of a road, it was held that the act of such commissioners in laying out the same was not a special and statutory authority, and that, therefore, it must appear by the proceedings or by proof alunde, that they had jurisdiction. Miller v. Brown, 56 N. Y. 383.

4. Ministerial duties.

The work of repairing highways is ministerial. Harris v. Carson, 40 Ill. App. 147.

Where ministerial duties are cast upon officers 22 U. R. A.

Start, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's evidence tended to show that, while she was riding in the village of Rutland, her horse became frightened and unmanageable by reason of the appearance and noise caused by the operation of a stone crusher, located partly on the land of one Engram, and partly within the boundaries of the highway, and a little beyond the village limits; that the horse, by reason of be-exercising judicial functions, the violation of such ministerial duty being absolute, certain, and imperative incurs a civil responsibility. Wilson v. New York, 1 Denio, 595, 43 Am. Dec. 713; Rochester White Lead Co. v. Rochester, 3 N. Y. 463, 53 Am. Dec. 316; Hutson v. New York, 5 Sandf. 239; Peck v. Batavia, 32 Barb. 634; Olmsted v. Deunla, 77 N. Y. 373; Piercy v. Averill, 37 Hun, 361; White v. Phillipston, 10 Met. 109; Harris v. Carson, supra; McCord v. High, 24 Iowa, 336; Lacour v. New York, 3 Duer, 406; Lloyd v. New York, 5 N. Y. 369, 55 Am. Dec. 347; Camden v. Mulford, 26 N. J. L. 53; Tearney v. Smith, 33 Ill. 391; Mills v. Brooklyn, 32 N. Y. 499; Robinson v. Bohr, 2 L. R. A. 366, 73 Wis. 456; Hovey v. Barkhoof, 42 N. Y. 113.

Even though by the Act of 1881, chap. 95, § 31, a city was declared not liable. Piercy v. Averill, supra.

For the neglect of an imperative duty there is a civil liability. Adsit v. Brady, 4 Hill, 630, 40 Am. Dec. 306; Shepherd v. Lincoln, 17 Wend. 250; Robinson v. Chamberlain, 34 N. Y. 397, 90 Am. Dec. 713; Fulton F. Ins. Co. v. Baldwin, 37 N. Y. 643; Hicks v. Dorn, 42 N. Y. 47, 53.

They must discharge their ministerial duties in a careful, prudent manner, without infringing on the rights of others, or unnecessarily injuring them. Hicks v. Dorn and Rochester White Lead Co. v. Rochester, supra; Robinson v. Chamberlain, 34 N. Y. 399, 90 Am. Dec. 713; Barton v. Syracuse, 36 N. Y. 57.

The general principle is, that where a duty of a ministerial character is imposed by law upon a public officer or corporation a negligent omission to perform the duty creates a liability on the part of such officer or corporation for the damages which individuals may sustain by reason of such omission, and that such liability may be enforced in a civil action by the injured party. McCarthy v. Syracuse, 46 N. Y. 196.

When authorized by law to exercise a merely ministerial act within a certain limit, he must obey the law to the letter, otherwise he violates it. Allen v. Com. 33 Va. 94.

A ministerial officer charged by statute with an absolute and certain duty, is liable for negligence. Clark v. Miller, 54 N. Y. 523.

Even though he refrained from action upon the honest belief that the statute charging such duty was unconstitutional. Ibid.

The act of a public officer in changing the crossing of a stream is ministerial in its nature, and it is his duty to perform it so as not to injure others. McCord v. High, 24 Iowa, 336.

Persons with judicial functions exercising ministerial acts are liable for damages for neglect. Ferguson v. Earl of Kinnoull, 3 Clark & F. 251.

5. Foundation of liability.

Duty and responsibility go along with power and opportunity. Harris v. Carson, 40 Ill. App. 147.

A public officer who is bound to do for others that which is beneficial to them must so perform it. Mason v. Pearson, 50 U. S. 9 How. 243, 13 L. ed. 125.

coming so frightened and unmanageable, went down an embankment, overturned the carriage, and severely injured the plaintiff. The plaintiff's evidence also tended to show that the stone crusher, as erected, located, and operated, was a public nuisance to travelers upon the highway, and that the defendants had to do with its location, erection, and operation on that occasion. The right to maintain and keep in repair the streets and highways in the territory embraced within the limits of the village of Rutland is given to the village by its charter, and the regular officers, elected by the village, having control of such maintenance and repair, are a president and eight trustees. The trustees are authorized by the charter to appoint a street commissioner, and, by the charter, it is made the duty of the street commissioner to superintend the construction and repair of streets, walks, culverts, sewers, and drains, subject to the authority and direction Negligence is the gist of the action. Warren v. Clement, 24 Hun, 472.

It is not necessary to show that such officer acted willfully or maliciously. Olmsted v. Dennis, 77 N. Y. 389; Day v. Crossman, 1 Hun, 570; Warren v. Clement, supra.

Negligence may be predicated of an omission to perform a duty enjoining personal supervision and care, as well as of an improper performance of such duty. Bostwick v. Barlow, 14 Hun, 177.

The controlling element in the question of such liability is, that the act complained of was a misfeasance. Nowell v. Wright, 3 Allen, 161, 80 Am. Dec. 62; Bell v. Josselyn, 3 Gray, 309, 68 Am. Dec. 741.

Their liability depends upon the powers conferred and the duties imposed upon them, and the means at their command to perform such duties. House v. Montgomery County Comrs. 60 Ind. 580, 28 Am. Rep. 687; Perry v. Barnett, 65 Ind. 522.

A violation of the duty imposed by statute must be shown. Smith v. Wright, 27 Barb. 621.

The question in all cases is, What was the particular nature of the office or agency held by the defendant, and how far his personal responsibility attached in reference to the matter complained of as causing the injury. Nowell v. Wright, 3 Allen, 161, 80 Am. Dec. 62.

The belief of the commissioners that they have exercised and used all means necessary, or in the sufficiency of the structure, is of no consequence or materiality in a defense to such action. Hover v. Barkhoof, 44 N. Y. 113.

And it matters not that such belief controverts any question of mala fides or malice, the question being negligence or no negligence. Ibid.

Where the issue is negligence, motives of good faith are immaterial. Ibid; Robinson v. Rohr, 2 L. R. A. 366, 73 Wis. 436.

The question is one for the jury. Stack v. Bangs, 6 Lane. 263.

6. Principles exempting from liability.

a. General.

The principle giving the public the right to enter upon land adjoining the highway, doing as little damage as possible, and to remove an obstruction, is applicable to the case of the highway surveyor. Johnson v. Dunn, 184 Mass. 522, where such obstruction caused the highway to be flooded.

In Sutton v. Clarke, 6 Taunt. 29, it was held that they were not liable to an action where there was no emolument for their services, in the absence of malice where they acted to the best of their skill and diligence, and upon the best information they could procure.

Whenever a person sued sets up a defense that he was an officer of the government, acting under color of law, it plainly devolves upon him to show that the law which he invokes authorized the particular act in question to be done, and that he acted in good faith. Flanders v. Tweed, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 504, 21 L. ed. 389; Robinson v. Rohr, 2 L. R. A. 366, 73 Wis. 436.

He must show that his acts were necessary for the construction, repair, or preservation of the road, and that the work was done at the proper place. Conwell v. Emrie, 4 Ind. 209, a case of damage sustained through the construction of a culvert.

His actions must be within the scope of his authority, in order to free him from liability. Ibid.

He must exercise his powers bona fide, and in a proper discharge of his duty to the public. Ibid.

If the acts are done within the scope of his authority, they do not become illegal by reason of the motive influencing them. Benjamin v. Wheeler, 8 Gray, 409; Denniston v. Clark, 125 Mass. 216; Upham v. Marsh, 123 Mass. 546.

The duties of every public officer charged with having public work done to be paid for by public money, is to take care that the work is performed on terms most advantageous to the public. State v. Kern, 51 N. J. L. 259.

If such officers exercise reasonable diligence and effort, no wilful failure, neglect, or refusal to discharge his duty can be imputed to him. Parker v. State, 29 Tex. App. 372; Moore v. State, 27 Tex. App. 439.

There is no duty, however, imposed upon highway commissioners to use their own personal exertions to repair or to guard the defects, by means of information as to the defects. Lament v. Haight, 44 How. Pr. 1.

Commissioners were held to be exempt from private action, not being a corporation and having no corporate funds. McKenzie v. Chovin, 1 McMull. L. 222.

They are not liable for consequential injuries resulting from an act within their authority. Bolton v. Crowther, 4 Dowl. & R. 195, 2 Barn. & C. 703, a case of negligence under Turnpike Act.

The injuries must not be consequential. East River Gas Light Co. v. Donnelly, 93 N. Y. 561.

There is no liability when the injury is not proximate or consequent upon the defendant's act. Day v. Crossman, 1 Hun, 570, 4 Thomp. & C. 124.

No private action for want of repairs will lie against a commissioner of a district. McKenzie v. Chovin, supra.

When the surveyor has acted in good faith, the land owner's remedy is against the township trustees, under 1 Rev. Stat. 1876, § 16, p. 858. Spitznogle v. Ward, 64 Ind. 30, following McOsker v. Burrell, 55 Ind. 425.

Where a village charter made a village a separate road district with its trustees as commissioners of highways, with powers similar to town commissioners, it was held that they were not independent public officers but agents of the village. Weed v. Ballston Spa, 76 N. Y. 329.

b. Error of judgment.

Ministerial and other public officers, though not employed in the ordinary administration of justice, when called upon by law to exercise a deliberate judgment, are not responsible for mere errors of judgment in the absence of corruption or malice. Austin v. Richardson, 1 Gratt. 827; Allen v. Com. 33 Va. 94; State v. Kern, 51 N. J. L. 259; State v. Starrup, 80 N. J. L. 423.

If such officers' acts are within their jurisdiction, of the trustees. By an ordinance adopted by the village, it is made the duty of the trustees to appoint a street commissioner, who shall have in charge the building and repairing of all streets and sidewalks in the village, the purchasing of material, and procuring of labor, under the direction of the trustees; and it is provided that all highway money shall be expended by orders drawn in favor of the street commissioners. The defendants were, at the time of the injury complained of, trustees, and had been, with one other, appointed by the president, a street committee of the trustees. The trustees purchased stone to be crushed for use upon the streets and highways of the village, taken from the ledge where the crusher was set up and operated. It was conceded in argument that the trustees voted to locate the stone crusher at the ledge.

The case of Bates v. Rutland, 62 Vt. 178, 9 L. R. A. 868, was an action in which the exercised with an honesty of purpose, with an intention of avoiding unnecessary injury, there is no personal liability for an error in judgment in the selection of location, or the mode of construction. Smith v. Gould, 59 Wis. 681, a case of construction of a ditch to preserve the highway under Wis. Rev. Stat. § 1238.

Malice, oppression, or arbitrary action must be shown. Green v. Swift, 47 Cal. 536, a case of a navigable river.

When bound under penalty to act, and that upon their own judgment in matters some whereof are quasi judicial it is unjust and contrary to public policy to hold them liable for an error of judgment. McOsker v. Burrell, 55 Ind. 425.

A supervisor acting within the scope of his authority, in good faith, is not liable to an action in his natural capacity for acts done in his official capacity. Ibid.

If his opinion is honest, he will not be liable even though it be erroneous. Ibid.

To the same effect are Carter v. Harrison, 5 Blackf. 138; Boyd v. Blaisdell, 15 Ind. 73; Conwell v. Emrie, 4 Ind. 208.

c. Matters of discretion.

The best judgment and discretion must be used, and though punishable for their corrupt acts, yet they are not civilly liable for the execution of the trust reposed in them. Wilson v. New York, 1 Denio, 595, 43 Am. Dec. 719.

Where their powers are discretionary to be exercised or withheld according to the officer's own views of necessity and propriety, they are judicial, and he will be exempt from responsibility for the motive influencing him, and the manner of performance. Ibid.; Cole v. Medina Village Trustees, 27 Barb. 218; Peck v. Batavia, 32 Barb. 634. But see McCord v. High, 24 Iowa, 336.

Where the discretionary acts were done honestly, even though injury resulted, highway commissioners were held not liable for negligence, malice or wantonness not being shown. Yealy v. Fink, 43 Pa. 212, 32 Am. Dec. 556; a case of damages to water rights caused by the construction of a causeway instead of a bridge.

Commissioners are not liable for acts done within the scope of their authority, no malice being shown. Burton v. Fulton, 49 Pa. 151.

Such officers are not liable for an act, the doing of which lies in their discretion, unless they act with malice. Edwards v. Ferguson, 73 Mo. 686; Reed v. Conway, 20 Mo. 22; Upham v. Marsh, 128 Mass. 546; Bay State Brick Co. v. Foster, 115 Mass. 431; Denniston v. Clark, 125 Mass. 216; Benjamin v. Wheeler, 8 Gray, 409, 15 Gray, 486; Burr v. Leicester, 121 Mass. 241; Morrison v. Howe, Morrison v. Clemence, 120 Mass. 565; Johnson v. Dunn, 184 Mass. 522; Wilson v. New York, Cole v. Medina Village Trustees, and Peck v. Batavia, supra; Baker v. State, 27 Ind. 485; McOsker v. Burrell, 55 Ind. 425; Carter v. Harrison, 5 Blackf. 138; Boyd v. Blaisdell, 15 Ind. 73; Conwell v. Emrie, 4 Ind. 208; Tearney v. Smith, 88 Ill. 391; Cubit v. O'Dett, 61 Mich. 247; Kendall v. Stokes, 4 U. S. 8 How. 101, 11 L. ed. 513; Allen v. Com. 88 Va. 94; Lacour v. New York, 3 Duer, 406; 22 L. R. A.

Griffith v. Follett, 20 Barb. 620; Urquhart v. Ogdensburg, 61 N. Y. 67, 43 Am. Rep. 655; Hines v. Lockport, 60 N. Y. 238; Mills v. Brooklyn, 22 N. Y. 490; Waldron v. Berry, 51 N. H. 136.

The exercise of good faith in the use of such discretion will be presumed. Garlinghouse v. Jacobs, 29 N. Y. 297.

In all such cases the question is, Did the surveyor or officer perform the act bona fide in the discharge of his duty "according to the best of his abilities." Waldron v. Berry, supra.

The discretion of a highway officer as to how and where he will expend highway labor is limited by the rights of individuals, for a violation whereof he is liable. Tearney v. Smith, and Cubit v. O'Dett, supra.

Where, however, the discretion has been exercised, and the improvement made, the duty to keep in repair is ministerial and for its neglect an action of damage will lie. Hines v. Lockport, supra.

For mere incidental damages, where their acts are exercised with discretion, such officers are not liable. Rowe v. Addison, 34 N. H. 306.

Aliter if wanton, malicious, or improper. Ibid., a case of an improper bar across a highway.

The decision of such commissioners as to what constitutes an obstruction in a highway is conclusive. Morrison v. Howe, Morrison v. Clemence, Denniston v. Clark, and Johnson v. Dunn, supra.

And so with respect to the necessity of repairs, their motives not being important. Denniston v. Clark, and Johnson v. Dunn, supra.

The only remedy open to the land owner for an injury occasioned by their action, is under the statute. Ibid.

In a case where the surveyor of a highway took material from the body of the same and deposited it upon his own land for the purpose of lowering the road at that point, upon suit brought by adjoining owners for breaking and entering, the court held that the surveyor was not liable as he acted within the scope of his power and discretion, his decision that such removal was necessary being conclusive upon all parties. Upham v. Marsh, Morrison v. Howe, Morrison v. Clemence, and Bay State Brick Co. v. Foster, supra, to the same effect.

Their judgment as to the removal of earth or gravel from one portion of a highway to another, or to a different road within their jurisdiction, is also conclusive as to the necessity of the action. Denniston v. Clark, 125 Mass. 216; Benjamin v. Wheeler, 8 Gray, 409, 15 Gray, 486; Bay State Brick Co. v. Foster, 115 Mass. 431; Morrison v. Howe, Morrison v. Clemence, 120 Mass. 565; Burr v. Leicester, 121 Mass. 241.

Such officers were held not liable for damage occasioned by the flow of water on plaintiff's land through the raising of the grade of the street, the court holding that their powers were judicial and discretionary. Wilson v. New York, 1 Denio, 595, 43 Am. Dec. 719.

Where the members of a common council exercise a legal discretion, there is no individual liability, either civil or criminal, in the absence of corruption. Baker v. State, 77 Ind. 485.

The mere fact that an officer is clothed with dis-plaintiff sought a recovery on account of the injury complained of in this case; and in that case it was held that the officers by whom the work was being prosecuted were, for this purpose, public officers, and that the village was not liable.

The liability of public officers to individuals for negligence in the exercise of official powers and the performance of official duties is fully discussed in Daniels v. Hathaway, 65 Vt.—, and it is unnecessary to repeat what is there said. That case and the cases there cited are sufficient authority for holding that the defendants are not liable, provided, in the matter complained of, they were in the exercise of strictly official powers and the performance of strictly official duties. In the purchase of the ledge, and advising and voting to there locate the stone crusher, the defendants were in the exercise of strictly official powers and duties; and, if they acted without corruption or malice, they are not cretion in the method of performing his work will not render his acts judicial. McCord v. High, 24 Iowa, 386.

d. Necessity of funds.

The duty of surveyors or commissioners of highways with respect to the repair of the same extends only so far as the funds will allow. Garlinghouse v. Jacobs, 29 N. Y. 297.

Their obligation is qualified and not absolute, depending upon funds or their means of acquiring them. Smith v. Wright, 27 Barb. 621; Flynn v. Hurd, 118 N. Y. 19; Galen v. Clyde & Rose Pl. Road Co. 27 Barb. 643; Hutson v. New York, 5 Sandf. 289.

If such officers have funds, or the authority to procure them, and neglect their duty, make no effort to procure them, they are liable for damages. Warren v. Clement, 24 Hun, 472; Hover v. Barkhoof, 44 N. Y. 113; Olmsted v. Dennis, 77 N. Y. 382; Lament v. Haight, 44 How. Pr. 3; Hutson v. New York, 9 N. Y. 168, 59 Am. Dec. 526; Hazadorn v. Raux, 72 N. Y. 583; Adst v. Brady, 4 Hill, 680, 40 Am. Dec. 305; Garlinghouse v. Jacobs, supra; Robinson v. Chamberlain, 34 N. Y. 402, 90 Am. Dec. 713.

Highway commissioners are responsible civilly for injuries resulting from neglect if funds are provided. People v. Esopus Town Auditors, 74 N. Y. 810; People v. Little Valley Town Auditors, 75 N. Y. 316.

Their liability is individual for any wrong they may commit or for any injury occasioned through neglect, provided they have funds sufficient for the purpose. People v. Little Valley Town Auditors, supra.

When the means are at hand, or under their control, their duty becomes absolute and they are liable for negligence. Hutson v. New York, 5 Sandf. 289.

To be liable they must be provided with funds by their towns, or specially commanded and empowered by the statute to perform the work. Flynn v. Hurd, and Galen v. Clyde & Rose Pl. Road Co. supra.

The absence of funds or the legal means of procuring them, will excuse their liability. Hines v. Lockport, 60 N. Y. 238.

Funds or the means of acquiring them must be provided. Day v. Crossman, 1 Hun, 570.

The general rule that the plaintiff must show adequate means in the defendant does not apply where the officer has been guilty of misfeasance to the special damage of the plaintiff. Bennett v. Whitney, 94 N. Y. 302; Rector v. Pierce, 8 Thomp. & C. 416 (where the plaintiff's intestate met death by being driven off the bridge in a carriage); Shepherd v. Lincoln, 17 Wend. 250.

Having the necessary funds in hand or under control, commissioners are bound to repair bridges that are out of repair, they having notice of their condition, with reasonable and ordinary care and diligence; and if they omit this duty they are liable to individuals who sustain special damage from such neglect. Hover v. Barkhoof, 44 N. Y. 113.

The commissioners of the highways in the city of New York have funds for the repair of highways within their control, or if not, have it within their power to obtain them, and therefore their duty becomes absolute and they are liable for a neglect thereof. Hutson v. New York, 5 Sandf. 289.

A reasonable official diligence to obtain the funds when the power to apply them is conferred, should be shown in order to justify exoneration, when such commissioners have knowledge of defects and unsafe condition of roads or bridges, or the approaches thereto. Lament v. Haight, 44 How. Pr. 1; Warren v. Clement, 24 Hun, 472.

The neglect to acquire funds after notice of the defect, or to repair upon the town's credit where he can do so, will render the commissioner liable. Lament v. Haight, supra.

It is for the defendant to prove the want of means. Weed v. Ballston Spa, 78 N. Y. 329; Adst v. Brady, 4 Hill, 680, 40 Am. Dec. 305; Hines v. Lockport, 60 N. Y. 238; Erie v. Schwingle, 22 Pa. 384, 40 Am. Dec. 87.

If the defendant can show that he has no means or funds for repairs, and no power to repair upon credit, he has a good defense to an action for negligence. Garlinghouse v. Jacobs, 29 N. Y. 297; Hover v. Barkhoof, supra.

In order to escape liability they must not only show want of funds, but also the use of every endeavor to obtain the same. Warren v. Clement, supra.

Yet they have a discretion in the application of such funds. Garlinghouse v. Jacobs, supra.

Their discretion in the dispensation of such funds extends to the most urgent needs, in the exercise of which they are not liable. Monk v. New Utrecht, 104 N. Y. 552; Garlinghouse v. Jacobs, and Hover v. Barkhoof, supra.

In People v. Adst, 2 Hill, 619, it was held that it must be shown that the commissioners had funds or the means to defray expenses, before an indictment would lie against them.

Since the New York Act of 1861, Laws, chap. 750, it must be averred that the town had funds or the means of obtaining them. Reveigh v. Hounsfield, 34 Hun, 140.

The same principles were applied to a case where damages were claimed by reason of the stoppage of navigation, through the negligent acts of the defendant under a contract with the state inuring for the benefit of all. Briggs v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co. 80 Hun, 291.

An allegation of funds was held not necessary in an action for negligence against a canal commissioner. Griffith v. Follett, 20 Barb. 620.

Where the commissioners were clothed with the power to obtain the means for the rebuilding of a bridge, but refused to exercise it and resolved to put it off till the following spring, the court held them liable for damage to the plaintiff's horses occasioned by their negligence. Hover v. Barkhoof, 44 N. Y. 113, following Robinson v. Chamberlain, 34 N. Y. 389, 90 Am. Dec. 712; Adst v. Brady, 4 Hill, 680, 40 Am. Dec. 305.

Such liability exists in the absence of contributory negligence on the claimant's part. Hover v. Barkhoof, supra; Warren v. Clement, 24 Hun, 472; Olmsted v. Dennis, 77 N. Y. 382; Lament v. Haight, 44 How. Pr. 3; Hutson v. New York, 9 N. Y. 168, 59 accountable to an individual for damages resulting from such acts. In purchasing the ledge, and voting to locate the stone crusher, the trustees were adopting measures and plans for the improvement and repair of the streets and highways. It was their duty to adopt plans for this purpose. In so doing, they were required to exercise judgment and discretion; and if, by reason of their failure to exercise the highest degree of judgment and discretion, their plans were defective, and could not be executed without creating a public nuisance, or endangering the traveling public, they are not accountable to a private person for damages resulting from the adoption of such plans.

In Robinson v. Rohr, 73 Wis. 486, 2 L. R. A. 366, it is said that a board of street commissioners, when they determine upon the work, and adopt plans and specifications of it, act as public officers, exercising judicial and legislative powers; and they are not

Where such commissioners cannot be charged with any fault or negligence in respect to the funds there is no liability. Smith v. Wright, 27 Barb. 621.

The plaintiff must aver and prove the possession of funds. Ibid.

Such commissioners are liable, after sufficient notice of the defects, if they have or are able to procure the funds. Babcock v. Gifford, 29 Hun, 186; Hover v. Barkhoof and Warren v. Clement, supra; N. Y. Laws 1868, chap. 108.

e. Order of the court.

An order of the county court directing an overseer to open a road in his district protects him from an action of trespass and damage by the land owner. Patten v. Weightman, 51 Mo. 432.

Into the regularity of the proceedings of the county court in locating a road a jury, in a subsequent action by the land owner, have no power to look or inquire. Ibid.

If the court has power and nothing appears illegal, such officers ought not to be held for the court's errors. Peery v. Gill, 36 Mo. App. 686; Howard v. Clark, 43 Mo. 344; Brown v. Harris, 52 Mo. 303; Patrick v. Von Gerichte, 10 Mo. App. 425.

After a road has been laid out by viewers, and their report approved by the court, an order issues to the supervisors to open the same for public use, and in the execution of such order they are protected. Wagner v. Salzburg, 132 Pa. 636.

If they vary the directions or do not act lawfully, they are as liable to the party injured thereby as any other trespasser would be, but so long as they keep the terms of the order, neither they nor the township they represent are liable for what is lawfully done. Ibid.

Such officer is not presumed to know of an error in the order of the court directing improvements. Peery v. Gill, supra.

They are not liable for erroneous orders of the county courts opening a road. Yeager v. Carpenter, 8 Loigh, 154, 31 Am. Dec. 665.

The origin or cause of the irregularity or error in the judgment of the court cannot increase or lessen the officer's liability. Crenshaw v. Snyder, 117 Mo. 167; Walker v. Likens, 24 Mo. 298; Evans v. Haefner, 29 Mo. 141.

If an order of the county court opening a road is void, the entry of the overseers is a trespass upon realty over which a justice has no jurisdiction. Cookrum v. Williamson, 53 Ark. 131.

Where damages had not been assessed under the Missouri Act of March 3, 1851, it was held that the fact did not entitle the owner of the land to maintain trespass against those entering the land under an order of the county court and cutting timber upon the line of the located road. Walker v. Likens, supra.

In Walker v. Likens, supra, the owner of land was not allowed to maintain trespass against the overseer of a road, acting under the orders of the county court, in proceeding to open a road over the plaintiff's land, even though no consent of the owner was shown upon the commissioners' report, or that proper steps had been taken to condemn the land.

In Lingo v. Burford, 112 Mo. 149, the court refused to restrain the overseer from proceeding to open a public road over and through the plaintiff's land, the county court having found that due notice had been given according to law, pursuant to section 7797 of the Revised Statutes of Missouri of 1860.

Where suit was brought for the removal of a fence, whereby the plaintiff's personal property was injured by stock trespassing, the court held that if the order of the county court opening the road was valid and binding upon the land owner, then the road overseer, who entered pursuant thereto, had authority to remove the fence where it obstructed the highway without becoming responsible. Cookrum v. Williamson, supra.

Where a constitutional safeguard was set at naught, the remedy was not considered as lying in an action against the officer who was acting in conformity to the orders of the court, having jurisdiction. Walker v. Likens, 24 Mo. 298.

7. Necessity of notice.

a. To officers.

A notice of defects is not necessary. Conroy v. Gale, 5 Lans. 344, 47 N. Y. 665; Stack v. Bangs, 6 Lans. 232; McCarthy v. Syracuse, 46 N. Y. 197.

Actual notice of a defect is not necessary. If such defect is notorious and presumably known, such notice will be presumed. Requa v. Rochester, 45 N. Y. 120, 6 Am. Rep. 52; Weed v. Ballston Spa, 78 N. Y. 323; Diveny v. Elmira, 51 N. Y. 506; Hume v. New York, 47 N. Y. 639.

The liability may be established without notice, as their ignorance would prove per se neglect of duty. Bostwick v. Barlow, 14 Hun, 177.

The rule is not limited to cases of actual notice, as their ignorance might be culpable. Hover v. Barkhoof, 44 N. Y. 113.

The duty imposed by 1 N. Y. Rev. Stat., 501, § 1, is not discharged by waiting for notice of defects and by repairing after notification. Bostwick v. Barlow, supra.

Where notice of the unsafe character of a bridge was received twelve months prior to the accident, the court held the commissioner liable for negligence, the neglect of duty being his own exclusive act and wrong. Lament v. Haight, 44 How. Pr. 1.

b. To land owner.

Before surveyors can remove a fence or obstruction in a public highway, other than an immediate obstruction, they are required, under section 905 of the Iowa Revised Statutes, to give six months' notice to the property owner. Mosier v. Vincent, 24 Iowa, 473.

No matter whether the fence existed prior or subsequent to the making of the highway. Ibid.

And such surveyors cannot justify their action by the map under § 890 of such Revised Statute, unless the road existed de facto or de jure in the locus in quo. Ibid.; Campbell v. Kennedy, 24 Iowa, 494.

amenable to any one except the public for any error, negligence, or mere misfeasance in matters within their jurisdiction.

In Wheeler v. Worcester, 10 Allen, 591, it is said that the city, by its properly authorized agents, is charged with the public duty of constructing and maintaining the public streets. It must construct and maintain them in such places and in such manner as the public convenience and necessity require. It must provide for the disposal of the surface water which falls upon them, and, in the discharge of this duty, neither the city nor its agents can be proceeded against in an action of tort for damages sustained by a private citizen. In Urquhart v. Ogdensburg, 91 N. Y. 67, 43 Am. Rep. 655, it was held that a municipal corporation is not liable for an injury to a traveler upon its streets resulting from the construction of a sidewalk upon an erroneous plan prepared or approved by its common council; that the rule is well

And reasonable notice to remove a fence which causes an obstruction must be given. Blackburn v. Powers, 40 Iowa, 681.

Reasonable notice is such notice, and for such a length of time, as, under all the facts and circumstances of the case, may be found reasonably proper to enable the plaintiff in the ordinary manner to properly and carefully remove the fence without unnecessary injury thereto, or to the premises or crops enclosed thereby. Ibid., following Mosier v. Vincent, supra.

Where notice was given the land owner of the filing of a petition for opening a road, and a final judgment had thereon, the court held that the land owner had no remedy against the overseer for damages, as depriving him of his property without due process of law, the order not being void upon its face, either through recital of relinquishment of the right of way, or failure to designate the time of taking possession, the latter being a mere irregularity. Crenshaw v. Snyder, 117 Mo. 167.

8. Principles sustaining liability.

An action will lie against the public officer for acts of omission or commission causing injury. Henly v. Lyme Regis, 5 Bing. 91.

They were held responsible for negligence, in Rochester White Lead Co. v. Rochester, 8 N. Y. 463, 53 Am. Dec. 316; Bailey v. New York, 8 Hill, 531, 38 Am. Dec. 609.

At common law, commissioners were personally liable for the consequence of their own negligence, and not the town for which they were neither agents nor servants; but by legislative enactments towns are now liable where commissioners would be. Embler v. Wallkill, 57 Hun, 384.

Where their acts are invasive of private rights they are liable personally in cases where there is no other remedy, and that, without proof of malice or an intention to injure. McCord v. High, 24 Iowa, 336.

But if their actions are not bona fide, but negligent and corrupt, they are personally liable for damages occasioned thereby, notwithstanding that under 1 Rev. Stat. 1876, p. 855 (§ 18 of the Act of March 5, 1859), the remedy is by way of assessment of damages. McOsker v. Burrell, 55 Ind. 425.

In Bartlett v. Crozier, 15 Johns. 250, it was held that where an injury is suffered by the act of a public officer, contrary to his duty, the injured party might maintain an action on the case against him.

The right of action should be confined to cases where the services of the officer are not gratuitous or coerced, but voluntary and attended with compensation, and also where the duty to be performed is entire, absolute, and perfect. Bartlett v. Crozier, 17 Johns. 450, 8 Am. Dec. 423.

The ground of reversal in Bartlett v. Crozier, 17 Johns. 450, 8 Am. Dec. 423, was not on account of the broad statement of the doctrine, as laid down in the court below, but because it did not apply to the case of overseers of highways, no such responsibility attaching, they not being clothed with authority or charged with an absolute duty.

Where the breach is that of a private duty to an individual, an action lies for its abuse in case injury ensues, but if such duty is public, no private liability attaches at common law, even though the public be more or less injured. Sussex County Chosen Freeholders v. Strader, 18 N. J. L. 108, 35 Am. Dec. 630, where damages were sought for the value of a horse which fell off a bridge, but relief was denied, the only remedy being by presentment. To the same effect, Cooley v. Essex Chosen Freeholders, 27 N. J. L. 415.

For personal negligence in the performance of the work required of them, they are personally liable should injury occur. Harris v. Carson, 40 Ill. App. 147; Tearney v. Smith, 36 Ill. 391; Skinner v. Morgan, 21 Ill. App. 209; Allen v. Michel, 38 Ill. App. 313.

But at common law their action must be wanton, malicious, or improper. Adams v. Richardson, 43 N. H. 212.

A person assuming the duties and invested with the powers of a public officer is liable for injuries sustained through his negligence. Bennett v. Whitney, 94 N. Y. 302, a case of unguarded and unlighted opening temporarily made in the street.

The public officer who undertakes to destroy private property under the claim of great public or overruling necessity takes upon himself the burden of proving the necessity of his action. Russell v. New York, 2 Denio, 475; Hicks v. Dorn, 43 N. Y. 47, 53.

In Adsit v. Brady, 4 Hill, 630, 40 Am. Dec. 305, public officers acting contrary to their duty, either by way of nonfeasance or misfeasance, were held liable for injuries occasioned thereby. Bailey v. New York, 8 Hill, 531, 38 Am. Dec. 609, to the same effect.

So they are liable for acts done outside their authority. Bailey v. New York, supra.

A civil action will lie by any one sustaining peculiar damages by reason of the nonfeasance wherever an indictment would lie. Hutson v. New York, 5 Sandf. 289.

Where an officer of a corporation performs an illegal act, resulting in injury to another, he is liable. Peck v. Cooper, 112 Ill. 192, 54 Am. Rep. 231; Robinson v. Rohr, 2 L. R. A. 306, 73 Wis. 436.

When the duties imposed by law upon highway officers are not discharged, and injury results to a traveler without his fault, he has a cause of action for the damages sustained. Embler v. Wallkill, 57 Hun, 384.

Where a statute imposed an affirmative duty to repair and to present vouchers, commissioners of highways were held liable as a quasi corporation, and that individually. Babcock v. Gifford, 29 Hun, 186.

In Hathaway v. Hinton, 46 N. C. 243, such officers were held liable for special damages.

In Beardslee v. French, 7 Conn. 125, 18 Am. Dec. 86, the court held the party removing an obstruction liable for wanton and unnecessary destruction of property.

When he is liable for a lawless act, all of his assistants are liable with him for the consequent injury. Cubit v. O'Dett, 51 Mich. 347.

settled that, where power is conferred upon public officers of a municipal corporation to make improvements, such as streets and sewers, and keep them in repair, the duty to make them is quasi judicial or discretionary, involving a determination as to their necessity, requisite capacity, and location; and that, for a failure to exercise this power, or an erroneous estimate of the public needs, no civil action can be maintained.

In Lansing v. Toolan, 87 Mich. 152, Cooley,

Ch. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "In planning public works, a municipal corporation must determine for itself to what extent it will guard against possible accidents. Courts and jurors are not to say it shall be punished in damages for not giving the public more complete protection, for that would be to take the administration of municipal affairs out of the hands to which it has been intrusted by law."

The evidence did not tend to show that the

The absence of bad faith is no excuse, but may be an aggravation. Ibid.

It is not necessary to prove such a defective condition as to be apparent. Stack v. Bangs, 6 Lana. 283.

It is sufficient if the defects could have been discovered by reasonable examination. Ibid.

A party contracting with a municipal corporation to keep any portion of a street in repair, contracts with the public and is liable for an injury sustained through his negligence. McMahon v. Second Ave. R. Co. 11 Hun, 347.

Drains cannot be cut so as to flood the property of private owners. Cubit v. O'Dett, supra; Ashley v. Port Huron, 36 Mich. 286, 24 Am. Rep. 552.

Such commissioners have power to remove trees which interfere with the making of a road, but are liable in trespass if they use the timber, and the value thereof may be assessed against them as damages. Tucker v. Eldred, 6 R. I. 404.

So street commissioners have been held liable for damages done by the removal of lateral support for adjacent lands. Buskirk v. Strickland, 47 Mich. 389, the injury being the direct and immediate result of their acts.

A road surveyor cannot justify his action in pulling down a house or building as an obstruction to a highway, upon the ground that it is done in the exercise of his duty, where he uses his cloak of office for the purpose of injuring the plaintiff. Wilding v. Hough, 37 Iowa, 448.

A state contractor, who has a right to do all that the state might do in the progress of work, would not be justified in casting material upon the premises of a private owner, as the state could not intrude upon the lawful possession of a citizen, except as provided by law. St. Peter v. Denison, 58 N. Y. 416, 17 Am. Rep. 258; Hay v. Cohoes, 2 N. Y. 159, 51 Am. Dec. 279.

So where the obstruction or delapidated condition is the result of use which ought to have been anticipated, and could have been guarded against by occasional examination and cleansing, the omission to perform such duties was held a neglect of duty rendering the officer liable. McCarthy v. Syracuse, 46 N. Y. 196; Barton v. Syracuse, 36 N. Y. 54.

They are charged, as a public duty, with keeping public bridges in repair, and such duty is compulsory. State v. Demaree, 80 Ind. 522.

Where it is sought to recover for injuries sustained by the neglect of highway commissioners in the repairs of bridges, it must be alleged that the commissioners neglected to give directions for repairs, or that the bridge was over a stream intersecting the highway. Smith v. Wright, 27 Barb. 621.

The duty of such commissioners with respect to bridges not over a stream is simply one to give directions to repair, while as to those over streams intersecting highways, it is to cause them to be kept in repair. Ibid.

Where sewer commissioners acted carelessly and negligently in discharging their statutory duty, they were held liable for their acts in the absence of due care. Jones v. Bird, 5 Barn. & Ald. 837, 1 Dowl. & R. 497.

9. State decisions.

Under the California Acts of March 26, 1855, § 9, and April 28, 1855, § 5, if any damage results from the neglect to keep county bridges in repair, it must be sought either against the road supervisors or the overseers personally. Huffman v. San Joaquin County, 21 Cal. 423.

The fact that an overseer has the authority of the road commissioners to open a road will not protect the former where the laying out is illegal. Guptail v. Teft, 16 Ill. 365.

Not only the commissioners themselves, but others who would seek a justification under their orders, must take the responsibility of showing that a case existed justifying the issuing of their order. Ibid.

And it has been held that they are liable even if misled as to the true line of a road which they are authorized to open. Beyer v. Tanner, 29 Ill. 136.

In Tearney v. Smith, 36 Ill. 391, they were held personally liable for the negligent construction of a drain or ditch and of a grade or embankment, which caused surface water to flow upon plaintiff's land.

Where highway commissioners cut down a fence, part of which was shown to be within the lines of the highway, the court held they could not justify the trespass as being done in the laying out or opening of the public way. Shoup v. Shields, 116 Ill. 488.

Under the Illinois statutes, the commissioners "have charge of the roads and bridges of their respective towns" and are required "to keep the same in repair and to improve them so far as practicable." Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1889, chap. 121, § 2; Harris v. Carson, 40 Ill. App. 147.

In Lynn v. Adams, 2 Ind. 143, it was held that the Indiana statute gave no right of personal action against an overseer of roads for damages resulting from neglect of duty. To the same effect, Wabash & E. Canal Trustees v. Spears, 16 Ind. 441, 79 Am. Dec. 444; Morrison v. McFarland, 51 Ind. 203.

Under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1843, chap. 16, §§ 86, 87, surveyors are required to keep highways in their districts in repair, and for that purpose have power to enter upon any lands adjoining or near to such highway, and to construct ditches and drains necessary for the construction or repair of such highway. Conwell v. Emrie, 4 Ind. 209.

Where by statute a surveyor's duty only extended to small repairs, he was held not bound to repair a defect involving extraordinary expenditure, a duty to make small repairs not embracing those requiring extraordinary expenditure. Wilson v. Jefferson County, 13 Iowa, 161.

In McCord v. High, 24 Iowa, 386, road supervisors were held liable for injuries done in the construction of a crossing by the diversion of a stream.

A statute authorizing road overseers to enter upon any uncultivated land, unincumbered by a crop, will not protect an entry of such overseers upon cultivated land, even though no crop be growing or standing thereon. Barrett v. Nelson, 29 Kan. 504, a case of trespass upon wheat stubble.

Where curb-stones, the original property of the plaintiff, were removed, carried away, and sold by defendants acted corruptly or maliciously, or that they acted in a capacity other than that of public officers, in the exercise of strictly official powers and the performance of official duties; and the jury, by a special verdict, have found that the action of the defendants on that occasion, and in locating and operating the stone crusher, was taken in their capacity of street committee and trustees, in good faith, according to their best judgment. It is stated in the exceptions that the plain-tiff's evidence tended to show that the defendants had to do with the location, erection, and operation of the stone crusher, but it does not appear that they had any more to do with it than other members of the board of trustees. For aught that appears in the exceptions, the acts of the defendants in respect to the location, erection, and operation of the stone crusher were all official acts. It appears that the trustees purchased the ledge, and voted to there locate the stone crusher.

the defendant, upon the construction of a drain ouivert, the court held the plaintiff entitled to recover. Muzzey v. Davis, 54 Me. 361.

Where the roads were charged by statute with in the care of such commissioners, they were held responsible, their duties being defined and the means of performance provided by the statute. Anne Arundel County Comrs. v. Duckett, 20 Md. 468, 38 Am. Dec. 557.

In Maryland their liability attaches, not by reason of the common law, but under the statute. Anne Arundel County Comrs. v. Duvall, 54 Md. 350, 39 Am. Rep. 398.

In Calvert County Comrs. v. Gibson, 36 Md. 229, the court held that such action was not taken away by § 8, chap. 299, of the Statutes of 1868, permitting the bond of a supervisor to be put in evidence for the benefit of those injured.

The only remedy in Massachusetts to a party who suffers damages from the action of a highway surveyor, is under Gen. Stat., chap. 44, §§ 19, 20.

If the town should be bound to pay a fine for any deficiency of such surveyor, the latter would be liable to the town therefor, if such deficiency was created by his fault or neglect. White v. Phillipston, 10 Met. 108; Mass. Rev. Stat. chap. 15, §§ 83, 84.

The only remedy allowed to a party injured by the action of a surveyor of highways, who without the written consent of the selectmen, causes a watercourse, occasioned by the wash of water from the highway, to be conducted along the highway and within its limits so as to injure the plaintiff in the use of his property, is under §§ 5 and 6 of chap. 25, Rev. Stat. Benjamin v. Wheeler, 15 Gray, 438.

And evidence that such work was done in a wanton and improper manner is not admissible. Benjamin v. Wheeler, 8 Gray, 409, his motives not making his actions illegal.

Where the defendant had exclusive management and direction in the attending of a drawbridge, his position not being merely honorary, or gratuitous, but a salaried one, with full control, the statutes requiring him to furnish all necessary assistance for the opening and closing of the drawbridge, and for the lighting thereof, the court held such defendant, not being dependent upon his superior, the means furnished him being ample, was personally liable for an injury sustained by the improper shutting of the gates and hanging out of lanterns, as required by the Statutes of 1856, chap. 282, and of 1859, chap. 184. Nowell v. Wright, 3 Allen, 166, 30 Am. Dec. 62.

And the wantonness or improper conduct of the highway surveyors in such an action, the court held, did not affect the plaintiff's right, and evidence thereof was not admissible. Benjamin v. Wheeler, 15 Met. 436.

Where under Stat. 1890, chap. 237, stones were removed with gravel from a gravel pit cut upon plaintiff's land by the selectmen and placed, some upon the roadside and some upon other land of plaintiff, the court held, the acts of the surveyor not having been wanton, but necessary and incidental to the convenient and proper use of such pit, there was no liability. Hatch v. Hawkes, 128 Mass. 177.

Where the surveyor of highways removed stones from a gravel-pit laid out upon plaintiff's land, pursuant to Stat. 1890, chap. 237, for which the plaintiff claimed damages as not coming within the terms "earth and gravel," the court held such action would not lie, as the terms necessarily included stones suitable for the construction, repair, or improvement of such streets. Ibid.

As public officers highway surveyors are liable to severe penalties for failure to perform their official functions under Gen. Stat., chap. 18, §§ 74, 75. Walcott v. Swamscott, 1 Allen, 101; Johnson v. Dunn, 134 Mass. 522.

Where the acts of a surveyor of highways, in removing an obstruction upon plaintiff's land which flooded the highway, caused lands of the plaintiff to be flooded, the court held there was no liability, the acts of the surveyor being necessary and due care not to cause needless injury being exercised. Johnson v. Dunn, supra.

Where the committee of a school authorized the town surveyor, under the powers conferred upon them by Pub. Stat., chap. 44, § 46, to fell a tree upon its lot adjoining the highway, the court held there was no liability to the plaintiff at work upon the highway for injuries sustained by the fall of the tree. McKenna v. Kimball, 145 Mass. 555.

Where a general direction is given to the selectmen over the work of highway surveyors in their respective districts, to see that the money appropriated to such districts is carefully and judiciously expended, the responsibility of doing the work, directing the laborers and taking charge of the repairs, is that of the highway surveyor. Pratt v. Weymouth, 147 Mass. 245; Benjamin v. Wheeler, 15 Gray, 438; Pub. Stat. chap. 62, § 2.

In Nile's Highways Comrs. v. Martin, 4 Mich. 557, 69 Am. Dec. 333, commissioners were sued as a quasi corporation under chapter 119 of the Revised Statutes, for the damages for the non-repair of a bridge on the highway, and the court held that the act did not authorize any action against township officers by their name of office, except for acts done or for contracts made by them while acting within the scope of their official duty and authority, and that the action being brought for neglect of official duty, they were only liable individually and not officially as a quasi corporation.

In Sag v. Laurain, 19 Mich. 137, highway commissioners were held not liable when acting within their jurisdiction and violating no law.

Where the board of works and contractors were sued for changing the grade of a street without the consent of council, they were held liable in trespass. Larned v. Briscoe, 62 Mich. 393.

Road overseers and not the county boards are liable for damages resulting from the non-repair of roads. Sutton v. Carroll County Board of Police, 41 Miss. 236.

The party contracting with the county police board for the repair of a bridge was held responsible. Ibid.

In McConnell v. Dewey, 5 Neb. 385, the court held

By this purchase and vote, it may be said that the defendants had to do with the location, erection, and operation of the stone crusher; but the act of purchasing the ledge and voting to there locate the stone crusher were official acts. It does not appear that there was any testimony tending to show that the defendants went upon the streets, and participated in the execution of the orders of the trustees, or that they aided, assisted, participated in, or superintended the erection or operation of the stone crusher. We cannot presume that they performed other than strictly official acts for the purpose of finding error in the rulings of the court below. Error must affirmatively appear. If there was evidence tending to show that they became laborers, operatives, or superintendents in the matter of setting up and operating the stone crusher, it should be so stated in the exceptions. Unless there was such evidence, the court should have ordered a ver-there was no private action against a supervisor, his acts and duties being of a public nature, the legislature alone defining and regulating the duties and responsibilities of such an officer.

Where a highway was laid out by the selectmen of the town for the expressed purpose of countenancing the nonpayment of toll, the court held them liable. Third Turnp. Road Proprs. in New Hampshire v. Champney, 2 N. H. 190.

Where plaintiff's contention was that the road was not within the route laid out, the court held that the monuments must govern and not courses and distances. Miller v. Silsby, 8 N. H. 474.

An injury sustained through the wrongful act of a surveyor may be compensated by action of trespass or by criminal indictment. Adams v. Richardson, 48 N. H. 212; Comp. Stat. chap. 52, § 18.

Where an act provided that any ditch next or opposite to a dwelling, yard, or private way must be properly covered so as not to obstruct, the court held the surveyor personally liable for an uncovered trench or ditch which obstructed the passage of the highway, his acts being in violation of law. Waldron v. Berry, 51 N. H. 188.

The duty of overseers to open, clear out, and work the roads is imposed, not by an order of the township committee, but by an act of the legislature, and the act not the order of the committee enjoins the overseer to open, clear out, amend, or repair, as the exigency of the case may require. State v. Monmouth Plank Road Co. 28 N. J. L. 99; State v. Holliday, 8 N. J. L. 232.

Commissioners of highways were held liable in Clark v. Phelps, 4 Cow. 190, for laying out and opening a road through the plaintiff's buildings and property, the Act, 2 Rev. Laws, 270, §§ 1, 10, regulating highways not authorizing such steps.

The duty of repairing was expressly enjoined upon them by the second section of the New York Laws of 1853, chap. 609, p. 1140, in case of an unsafe bridge or culvert. Hover v. Barkhoof, 44 N. Y. 113.

Now the Laws of New York of 1881, chap. 700, § 1, impose the liability of all damages to persons or property, by reason of defective highways or bridges in cases where the commissioner of highways would previously have been liable, upon the several towns, instead of upon such commissioners, and by section 2 of the same Act such damages are a charge upon the town.

Section three gives a right of action by the town over and against the commissioners in cases where the defect in a highway or bridge has been caused by the misconduct or neglect of the commissioner of highways.

By section four, if the commissioners have acted in good faith and the defects have not been caused by their willful misconduct or neglect, the board of town auditors have power to audit and allow such judgment.

Section five provides that such commissioners shall not be relieved from any criminal liability in cases where by law they were previously subject thereto.

A party recovering a judgment against such commissioners cannot compel the board of town auditors to audit and allow such judgment as a valid claim against the town. People v. Little Valley Town Auditors, 75 N. Y. 318; People v. Esopus Town Auditors, 74 N. Y. 310.

Where the facts showed that the relator was the chief engineer of certain work, and also engineer of the department of public works, by the action of the chief of that department and his own concurrence, it was held that he was responsible for acts done in the duty he had assumed and might have refused. People v. Campbell, 82 N. Y. 247.

Where a city charter provided that its officers should be liable for damages "sustained by reason of wilful neglect" the court held the common-law liability for simple negligence still remained. Bennett v. Whitney, 94 N. Y. 902.

The responsibility attaches for the non-performance of any duty imposed by law. In Dunlap v. Knapp, 14 Ohio St. 64, 82 Am. Dec. 468, the court held that the only remedy against such an officer was under the statute for the penalty imposed, and not civilly.

But in Beckwith v. Beckwith, 22 Ohio St. 180, the supervisors were held liable in trespass for entering and digging upon plaintiff's land under the resurvey for the straightening of a road, the record of resurvey not protecting them, no order being given as in a case of a new road opened.

Where a ditch was constructed so as to divert the waters of a river from one part of a riparian proprietor's land to another, thereby changing the condition and cutting away part of the bank, compensation was allowed as the taking was within sections 1236, 1237, Wis. Rev. Stat. Smith v. Gould, 61 Wis. 81.

10. For acts of predecessors or successors.

The successors in office are not liable for the defaults of their predecessors. Lament v. Haight, 44 How. Pr. 1.

The misconduct of predecessors in office is not chargeable upon public officers acting as quasi trustees, each being answerable for his own defaults. Vose v. Reed, 54 N. Y. 657.

A supervisor will not be held liable for the negligence of his successor in not repairing a dam constructed by the former whereby the landowner's lands are flooded. McOsker v. Burrell, 55 Ind. 425.

11. For acts of employees.

Such officers are liable for the acts of their deputies. Blunt v. Sheppard, 1 Mo. 219.

The party authorizing a trespass is equally liable with him who occasions the act. State v. Smith, 78 Me. 280, 57 Am. Rep. 308.

A road supervisor is liable for the unskillful or negligent acts of persons employed by him in the repair of the road. Anne Arundel County Comrs. v. Duval, 54 Md. 350, 39 Am. Rep. 398.

If a public officer directs or authorizes the wrongful act of his sub-agent, or if the latter does not hold any office known to the law, but his appointment is private and discretionary with the officer, the latter is liable for such acts. Ely v. Parsons, 55 Conn. 83.

The superior officer cannot be indifferent or irresponsible for what he knows his inferior is dodict for the defendants, and the plaintiff has not been harmed by the failure of the court to charge as requested, or by the charge as given. It does not affirmatively appear that there was any testimony tending to show that the defendants were ever at the ledge where ing or intending to do, and cannot prevent or control. Harris v. Carson, 40 Ill. App. 147.

What is done by an overseer as such upon the highways in his district, with the knowledge of commissioners, must be presumed to have been done with their approval until the contrary is shown. Ibid.

But such officers are not responsible for the misconduct or malfeasance of those they are obliged to employ. Bailey v. New York, 3 Hill, 536, 38 Am. Dec. 669.

The relations of commissioners to overseers under the Illinois Statute, §§ 90, 91, are those of superiors. Hizer v. Rockford, 68 Ill. 325; Harris v. Carson, supra.

Where street commissioners disregard the city charter and adopt plans and specifications for certain work, undertake to carry them out practically, and do the work themselves, employing agents and servants to execute the plans and specifications manually, they act in a ministerial capacity and are liable for injuries sustained through the negligence of the employees of the board. Robinson v. Rohr, 2 L. R. A. 366, 73 Wis. 436.

Where notice of an obstruction to a highway was given to a selectman, who directed a private person "to cut the bush and trees and make the roads passable at as little expense as possible" leaving it to his discretion what to cut, such selectman was held liable to the land owner for unnecessary cutting. Ely v. Parsons, supra.

In Anne Arundel County Comrs. v. Duvall, supra, the county commissioners were held not liable for damages occasioned by the acts of a laborer employed upon the highway by the supervisor.

In trespass for breaking and entering, by taking a short cut over plaintiff's land, defendants acting, one as the officer of the town and the other as servant directing and assisting in repairs of a bridge, the court held the defendants not liable unless they authorized the action or directed it. Bachelor v. Pinkham, 68 Me. 253.

In McGuire v. Grant, 26 N. J. L. 856, 67 Am. Dec. 49, where committeemen ordered the doing of an act, lawful in itself, by workmen under orders and directions of an officer of the corporation, with whom the committeemen had no connection, they were held not liable for injuries resulting from the work.

In an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against the surveyor of highways, the defendant was held liable for damage done to plaintiff's grass through the felling of trees which fell and remained upon the latter's land, the acts being those of the surveyor's servants within the limits of the road, done within his view and impliedly assented to, no orders being given for their removal. Elder v. Bemis, 2 Met. 549.

The surveyors are responsible where the statute gives a remedy against them for the non-performance of those duties assigned to them, or for malfeasance in the discharge of them, but they are not responsible as the mere agents or servants of the town. White v. Phillipston, 10 Met. 108.

But the common-law rule, that the agent is liable over to his principal for damages occasioned through his negligence, does not apply to such a case, and a judgment against a town in a civil action is no ground for a suit against such officer. Ibid.

12. Adjoining towns.

In Bryan v. Landon, 5 Thomp. & C. 594, the highway commissioners of two adjoining towns were held jointly liable for the want of repair of a 22 L. R. A. bridge over a stream dividing the two towns, they having sufficient funds.

Where a commissioner repaired a bridge without giving notice to the commissioners of the towns jointly liable, it was held that they could not recover the proportion of the expense, because of the failure to comply with the requirements of the state statute. Flynn v. Hurd, 118 N. Y. 19.

Even though the commissioners notified, consented to the making of the repairs and thereafter united in the operations. Ibid.

13. Canals.

The liability of a canal commissioner depends upon the nature of the duty imposed upon him by the statute, and if this be imperative he is liable for damages for negligence. Griffith v. Follett, 20 Barb. 620.

He is liable for the neglect of duty in his private capacity. Ibid.

Under the New York Act of 1867, chap. 577, § 3, canal contractors are liable to individuals for negligence in the repair of canal bridges. Conroy v. Gale, 5 Lans. 344, 47 N. Y. 665.

It is the duty of a contractor for canal repairs, under the New York Laws of 1866, chap. 836, § 9, to ascertain at his peril what ought to be done, not only to put, but to keep, the bridges in repair. Ibid.; French v. Donaldson, 57 N. Y. 496.

A contractor under a state contract for the enlargement of a canal cannot claim any delegation of sovereign power enabling him to confiscate property to public use permanently or temporarily, no right being given by the contract, and therefore his rights are no more than those of other individuals. St. Peter v. Denison, 58 N. Y. 416, 17 Am. Rep. 258.

The mere fact that the act was necessary will not justify a canal contractor in trespassing upon private lands; he must have the right to use such lands. Ibid.

Superintendents of canal repairs must stop any breaches and remove obstructions without waiting orders from the commissioners, or, in default, will be held liable for damages occasioned. Adsit v. Brady, 4 Hill, 680, 40 Am. Dec. 305.

A canal contractor was held personally liable for damage done to plaintiff's land by reason of a blast from the canal bed, even though no negligence was shown. St. Peter v. Denison, supra.

It has been held that the liability of such contractor is not affected by the appointment of a superintendent. French v. Donaldson, supra.

In Johnson v. Belden, 2 Lans. 423, a canal contractor was held liable for negligence for non-repair of the gates of a lock, although the same were opened by the boat captain, the latter believing the same unsafe.

The proprietors of a canal who were bound to construct it, so that rafts of a given size could pass, were held liable for damage done to plaintiff's raft which answered such description, by reason of the canal not being sufficient to pass such raft. Riddle v. Proprietors of Locks and Canals, 7 Mass. 169, 5 Am. Dec. 35.

Where the defendant, a superintendent of canal repairs, was by law (1 Rev. Stat. Edm's ed. p. 236, § 100), bound to keep the canal in repair, there being no discretion about the matter, the court held his duty was imperative, for the neglect of which he was liable for damages, his acts being ministerial. Hicks v. Dorn, 42 N. Y. 45, 53.

Where such superintendent undertook to destroy the plaintiff's boat claiming the act as necessary, the court held that the right did not exist.

the stone crusher was set up and operated. It does appear, from one of the special verdicts, that the stone crusher was being operated by help hired by the street commissioner, in the interest of the village, on the afternoon of July 12, 1888, in the presence of the street commissioner and the defendants, who were present as a street committee of the trustees to observe its operation, and to consult with the street commissioner about its work and other matters connected with the maintenance and repair of the highways, simply on account of convenience or economy, as all other expedients should have been first tried, and further that such action cast upon him the burden of proving the expediency or necessity of his action. Ibid.; Russell v. New York, 2 Denio, 475.

Where the canal board had a statutory authority to contract for canal repairs and gave the contractor the like duties and powers that superintendents had, it was held that said contractor was liable for damage occasioned to plaintiff's boat through negligence in not repairing, after notice of defects. Robinson v. Chamberlain, 84 N. Y. 389, 90 Am. Dec. 718; Fulton F. Ins. Co. v. Baldwin, 87 N. Y. 648; Johnson v. Belden, 47 N. Y. 180.

14 Criminal Liability.

Public officers of every grade and description may be impeached or indicted for official misconduct and corruption. Wilson v. New York, 1 Denio, 595, 43 Am. Dec. 719.

Officers of municipal corporations may make themselves personally liable for their crimes or torts. Chandler v. Bay St. Louis, 57 Miss. 326.

A road overseer is only charged with reasonable diligence and effort in the discharge of his duty, and cannot be held criminally liable for failing to keep the road in repair, where it is shown that to do so with the means available to him is impossible. Parker v. State, 20 Tex. App. 372; Moore v. State, 27 Tex. App. 430.

A failure to keep a public highway in repair by those who have assumed that duty from the state, so that it is unsafe to travel over, is a public nuisance, making the party bound to repair liable to indictment therefor and to an action at the suit of any one who has sustained special injury. Robinson v. Chamberlain, 84 N. Y. 389, 90 Am. Dec. 718; Lansing v. Smith, 8 Cow. 151; Smith v. Wright, 24 Barb. 170; Pierce v. Dart, 7 Cow. 608; Shepherd v. Lincoln, 17 Wend. 280; Adair v. Brady, 4 Hill, 690, 40 Am. Dec. 305; Lyme Regis v. Henley, 1 Bing. N. C. 222.

If a deficiency exists in the highways of a district, which is occasioned by the fault of such officer, he may be prosecuted by indictment. White v. Phillipston, 10 Met. 108.

They are bound to take the most advantageous terms for the performance of the work, and for any corrupt or willful dealing in the placing of a contract payable in public money, they are criminally liable. State v. Kern, 51 N. J. L. 259.

A willful and corrupt award of a contract for public work, on terms less advantageous than others, would be a neglect and breach of duty, such as would constitute official misbehavior indictable at common law. Ibid.; State v. Startup, 30 N. J. L. 423.

A corporation or individual who is bound to repair a public highway or navigable river, is liable to indictment for the neglect of such duty. People v. Albany, 11 Wend. 539, 27 Am. Dec. 85.

Supervisors are liable to indictment for neglecting to open a public highway, duly laid out in their respective townships. Com. v. Reiter, 78 Pa. 161; Graffins v. Com. 8 Penn. & W. 502; Edge v. Com. 7 Pa. 275; Phillips v. Com. 44 Pa. 197.

The opening of a wrong road is no defense to an indictment for neglect to open a highway there being no compliance with the legal duty of supervisors. Com. v. Johnson, 134 Pa. 635.

For any material change in the line of a road directed by an order of the court, supervisors are liable to indictment, although they follow lines made by their predecessors. Ibid.

If such judicial acts are corrupt, such officer is liable to be impeached or indicted, but no civil action will lie on behalf of the party injured. Wilson v. New York, 1 Denio, 595, 43 Am. Dec. 719.

If the board of public works has been forbidden by statute to contract for cleaning the streets without previous advertisement of the same, the doing of such prohibited act willfully and with evil intent constitutes a criminal offense and an indictment charging the members of the board engaged thereon is sufficient. State v. Startup, and State v. Kern, supra.

And in New Jersey, this liability is not taken away or affected by section 159 of the Statute of March 31, 1871, Pamph. Laws, p. 1094. State v. Kern, 51 N. J. L. 260.

Indictment against commissioners of a town for neglecting to keep the highways in order must set forth the matters by reason of which the obligation has been imposed on them, when there is no public law imposing the duty upon them. State v. Halifax, 15 N. C. 245.

The indictment must also charge specifically which of the duties imposed has been neglected. Ibid.

Where the information charged the defendants with permitting a nuisance by reason of non-repair of a bridge, so that it became unfit for public use describing them as "trustees of the Wabash & Erie Canal," the court held the same bad as not showing that the road or the bridge crossed the canal, and for not showing how they became possessed of the right or duty to repair. Butler v. State, 17 Ind. 450.

The duty is imposed by statute, under a penalty, and indictable under the South Carolina Act of 1825. McKenzie v. Chovin, 1 McMull. L. 223.

In Hill v. State, 4 Sneed, 442, they were held individually liable to indictment for neglect of repairs, their action being an official nonfeasance.

But in State v. Barksdale, 5 Humph. 154, they were held not liable to indictment.

The latter case is distinguished from Hill v. State, supra, the presentment not setting out the names of the persons or board holding office nor charging neglect of official duty.

In order to warrant a conviction of an overseer of a public road under article 409 of the Texas Penal Code, for failure, neglect, or refusal to perform the duties of his office, it must be shown that such failure, neglect, or refusal on his part was willful, that is, done with evil intent, with legal malice, without legal justification, and with no reasonable ground to believe his action legal. Parker v. State, 29 Tex. App. 372; Moore v. State, 27 Tex. App. 430.

In Thornton v. Springer, 5 Tex. 587, they were held not liable in damages, but only for the penalty imposed by Stat. 1848, § 4, § 5, p. 99.

The motion should state the appointment and notification thereof and continuous non-repair for twenty days. Thornton v. Springer, supra.

In Rex v. Dean, 2 Maule & S. 80, they were held liable to indictment for not obeying the order of the sessions court, directing the laying out of a road as a public road, and also to proceedings by way of a mandamus by the party entitled to the road. E. W.

streets, and lanes. There is nothing in this finding that shows that the testimony tended to prove that the defendants participated in the operation of the stone crusher, or that they acted other than in an official capacity. It was their duty to inform themselves in regard to the necessity of repairs upon the streets and the best methods of making them, in order that they might act intelligently as members of the board of trustees. It is unnecessary to pass upon the rulings of the court upon questions relating to the admission and rejection of evidence. If all the evidence offered by the plaintiff had been admitted, and all evidence objected to by the plaintiff had been excluded, it would still have been the duty of the court to have ordered a verdict for the defendants.

Judgment affirmed.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

Emma COOPER, Respt.,
v.
Callista PHIPPS et al., Appts.

(.....Or.....)

1. Evidence is inadmissible, in an action for libel in charging the plaintiff with uncharity, of her general reputation for virtue and chastity, where no attack is made upon it.
2. A witness in an action is not liable for libel, unless it is shown affirmatively that her statements were not pertinent to the matter in progress, and were spoken maliciously and with a view to defame the one claiming to be injured thereby.

(July 17, 1893.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jackson County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged publication of a libel. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. William M. Colvig and P. P. Prim & Son, for appellants:

The law presumes the character and public reputation of the plaintiff to be good, and of the best, until it is attacked, and she can safely rest upon that presumption. Without introducing any evidence, her reputation and character stood without qualification or defect and no evidence that she could offer could add to or increase its force and virtue.

NOTE.—Privilege of witness as to defamatory testimony.

The general doctrine of American cases, like that above reported, is that the testimony of a witness is privileged so long as it is pertinent to the case, or, as expressed in some cases, unless he wander from the point and maliciously heap slander on another. Morgan v. Booth, 13 Bush, 480.

So the defendant in a slander suit may show to negative malice that the words were spoken by him as a witness in a judicial proceeding. Nelson v. Robe, 6 Blackf. 204.

The pertinent testimony of a witness is absolutely privileged. Hutchinson v. Lewis, 75 Ind. 55.

And it is sufficient prima facie as a defense for uttering defamatory words to show that they were spoken by a defendant as a witness. Ibid.

The belief of a witness that his answers are pertinent relieves him from liability for an action of slander. Stelnecke v. Marx, 10 Mo. App. 581; White v. Carroll, 42 N. Y. 161, 1 Am. Rep. 533. See also Suydam v. Moffatt, infra.

A witness is absolutely privileged in making answers material to the case and believed to be true, even though he is actuated by malice as well as by purpose to perform his duty as a witness. Liles v. Gaster, 42 Ohio St. 681.

The belief of a witness as to the relevancy of his testimony in such a case is a question for the jury. White v. Carroll, supra.

Answers of a witness which are relevant and honestly made are privileged. Lanning v. Christy, 30 Ohio St. 115, 27 Am. Rep. 431.

Pertinent testimony of a witness is privileged, no matter if the witness is actuated by ill will. Calkins v. Sumner, 13 Wis. 193, 30 Am. Dec. 733.

For pertinent answers a witness can claim privilege, but not so as to voluntary slander which is not pertinent to the case. Barnes v. McCrate, 32 Me. 442.

But a witness is liable for impertinent, malignant words spoken by him without believing them to be true. Smith v. Howard, 28 Iowa, 61.

Words spoken by a witness with malicious intent to defame and which are not pertinent to the case may constitute slander. Hastings v. Lusk, 22 Wend. 410, 34 Am. Dec. 380.

Defamatory statements not pertinent to the issues nor believed to be so by the witness, but injected by him voluntarily and maliciously for the purpose of defaming and injuring another, are not privileged. Shadden v. McElwee, 36 Tenn. 146.

In Grove v. Brandenburg, 7 Blatchf. 234, defamatory words spoken by a witness were held on demurrer to be privileged, although it was alleged that the witness did "falsely, corruptly, and maliciously swear." But see later Indiana case, supra.

A declaration for slander in testimony as to the character of a witness on an attempt at impeachment was held in Cook v. Cook, 100 Mass. 194, to be insufficient for lack of necessary averments as to damages, but the question of privilege was not considered.

Testimony of a witness, who is also the defendant, in a suit for damages for discharging an employé, as to his reason for such discharge, is privileged. Fagan v. Fries, 90 Ill. App. 238.

A malicious statement by a witness which is not necessary to the answer of a question, but made to show excuse for failure to remember certain matter, is privileged. Hunkel v. Voneiff, 69 Md. 179, affirmed on rehearing, Id. 195.

In this case a majority of the court approves the English rule of absolute privilege for a witness from a civil action for libel for anything stated in the character of a witness, even though false and malicious, but the case does not necessarily decide what would be the result if a witness volunteered utterly irrelevant defamation which could in no respect be regarded as testimony in the case. Ibid.

Dec. 477; McCabe v. Platter, 6 Blackf. 405; Howard v. Patrick, 43 Mich. 121; Fahey v. Crotty, 68 Mich. 883; Lotto v. Davenport, 50 Minn. 99; Croasdale v. Bright, 6 Houst. (Del.) 52.

The rule of evidence as to such cases is to impose on the plaintiff the onus of rebutting those presumptions flowing from the seeming obligations and situation of the parties, and to require of him to bring home to the defendant the existence of malice that is malice in fact, as the true motive of his conduct.

Townshend, Slander & Libel, 4th ed. § 209, p. 296; King v. Root, 4 Wend. 118, 21 Am. Dec. 109.

Under the allegations of plaintiff's complaint, it is shown therein that Calistia Phipps was conditionally privileged when she uttered and published the alleged libel, and the plaintiff could not recover any damages in this case, unless the plaintiff could show by a preponderance of the evidence that Calistia Phipps was actuated by actual malice, or malice in fact against plaintiff.

See Kent v. Bongarts, 15 R. I. 72; Folkard's Starkie, Slander & Libel, p. 255.

Under the pleadings, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover at all, without proving that the words were uttered and published with actual malice against said plaintiff.

Messrs. Lionel R. Webster and Francis Fitch, for respondent:

A witness testifying in a court who maliciously defames another with the intent to injure the reputation of such other, or expose him or her to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, if such testimony is false and its falsity is known by the witness, is not protected from civil action for libel because of the privilege of a witness.

Townshend, Slander & Libel, § 223; Shadden v. McElwee, 86 Tenn. 146; Hutchinson v. Lewis, 75 Ind. 55; 1 Hilliard, Torts, 322; Cooley, Torts, 210; Nelson v. Robe, 6 Blackf. 204; Grove v. Brandenburg, 7 Blackf. 234; Mower v. Watson, 11 Vt. 536, 84 Am. Dec. 704.

The American rule modifies that enforced in England.

White v. Carroll, 42 N. Y. 161, 1 Am. Rep. 505; Smith v. Howard, 28 Iowa, 51; Barnes v. McCrate, 32 Me. 442.

In slander and libel charging plaintiff with being unchaste she may prove on her direct case that her general reputation for chastity and virtue is good.

1. To support the presumption that it is good.

2. Cases of slander and libel are exceptions

A witness who is obliged to answer interrogatories of a legislative committee is privileged in giving his answers, although they are defamatory. Terry v. Fellows, 21 La. Ann. 376.

Testimony given in an investigation legally held by the common council of a city is privileged, so that it cannot be deemed a repetition of a previous slander by the witness, showing express malice. McLaughlin v. Charles, 60 Hun, 236.

The immunity of a witness in a judicial proceeding from an action for defamation is not affected by Miss. Code, § 1004, which makes insulting words actionable. Verner v. Verner, 64 Miss. 321.

English cases.

Early English cases considered the relevancy or pertinency of testimony as material in determining the question of privilege.

It was held in Revis v. Smith, 18 C. B. 123, that words of a witness relevant to a case are privileged, and that the testimony of a witness is prima facie privileged.

So testimony in a slander case, that the plaintiff is a common liar, given to reduce the amount of his recovery, is privileged. Harding v. Bulman, Brownl. 2; Harding v. Bodman, Hutton, 11.

And a witness who on a former trial had testified as an expert that a certain signature was a forgery, and had been severely criticised by the judge in that case, and when asked in the later trial if he had read what the judge said persisted in saying, although the court tried to stop him, that the signature was forged, is within the rule giving privilege for words spoken in testimony, as these words were a part of his evidence and spoken in defense of his own character, which was in some degree impugned by the question asked him. Seaman v. Netherclift, L. R. 2 C. P. Div. 58, affirming, L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 540.

Butin Kennedy v. Hilliard, 10 Ir. C. L. Rep. 195, 1 L. T. N. S. 578, it is declared more broadly that an action will not lie for words spoken in evidence.

And in Dawkins v. Rokeby, L. R. 7 H. L. 744, affirming L. R. 8 Q. B. 255, the testimony of a witness is held to be absolutely privileged, although it is immaterial, irrelevant, and given malà fide, without reasonable or probable cause. In this case it is expressly declared that the same rule of privilege exists as to judges, counsel, witnesses, and parties.

This is in accord with the absolute privilege, declared in Munster v. Lamb, L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 588, to exist in respect to words of counsel, even if both malicious and irrelevant.

The privilege of witnesses extends to a person testifying before a committee of the house of commons. Goffin v. Donnelly, L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 307. See also Terry v. Fellows, 21 La. Ann. 376.

Also to testimony of a person taken before a military court of inquiry, which has no power to administer an oath. Dawkins v. Rokeby, supra.

Affidavits and depositions.

Statements in a deposition, tending to charge a person with arson, made by a witness, subpoenaed before a fire marshal having jurisdiction of the matter, are privileged. Newfield v. Copperman, 10 Jones & S. 302.

Words spoken in an affidavit pertinent to the matter involved in a judicial proceeding are privileged. Warner v. Paine, 2 Sandf. 195.

Thus an affidavit for attachment which is pertinent is privileged. Johnson v. King, 64 Tex. 232; Spaids v. Barrett, 37 Ill. 229, 11 Am. Rep. 10.

So an affidavit in chancery is privileged. Dawling v. Wenman, 2 Show. 446.

And an affidavit in support of an answer to an application for injunction is privileged, if pertinent. Hart v. Baxter, 47 Mich. 193.

to the general rule forbidding such proof in civil actions.

3. To enhance damages.

Actual ill will or malice will enhance the damages, but need not be shown to entitle plaintiff to recover.

Defendants are presumed to have used the words in the meaning in which they would ordinarily be accepted and understood, under the circumstances and in the connection in which they were used. If under these conditions the words would convey to a person of ordinary understanding the charge of unchastity, such meaning must be accepted.

Bean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal is brought to reverse a judgment for $5,000 recovered by plaintiff in an action for libel against the defendants. It is charged that in a certain suit for divorce and for the custody of a minor child, pending in the superior court for the county of San Francisco, state of California, between the defendant William Phipps, as plaintiff, and Minnie Phipps, a sister of the plaintiff herein, as defendant, Calistia Phipps, one of the defendants herein, was called and testified as a witness, and in response to the following interrogatory of counsel, "Has the defendant been in the habit of running around with other men?" answered: "Yes, sir; two young men came and rented a house, and she and her sister [meaning this plaintiff] lived with them, and kept house for them: did this about two months. All the neighbors talked about their scandalous conduct." That this testimony was reduced to writing by the court commissioner, and was duly filed, at the instance of the defendant William Phipps, and became a part of the records and files of said court. That defendant meant by said words to accuse the plaintiff of being an unchaste woman, and of having lived in notorious, lewd, and lascivious cohabitation with some man to plaintiff unknown. That such statement was false, malicious, and defamatory, and was made with malice, and with the intent to defame the plaintiff, and at the instigation and request of the defendant William Phipps. The answer admits that the defendant Calistia Phipps testified as alleged in the divorce suit, but denies the other allegations of the complaint, and affirmatively alleges that such testimony was given with a firm belief in its truth, in answer to an interrogatory propounded to her by counsel,

And the belief of the affiant that the matter in his affidavit for a motion is pertinent makes it privileged. Suydam v. Moffat, 1 Sandf. 459.

But a witness may be charged with criminal libel in making malicious defamation in an affidavit which is not pertinent to the matter involved in the proceeding although the presumption in respect to testimony is in favor of the privilege. Com. v. Culver, 1 Pa. L. J. Rep. 361.

The charge in an affidavit that another witness is guilty of perjury is privileged. Warner v. Paine, supra.

An affidavit to support a motion for a new trial attacking the character of a witness for veracity is privileged. Burke v. Ryan, 36 La. Ann. 951.

In Rex v. Salisbury, 1 Ld. Raym. 341, it was held that the publication of an affidavit containing scandal was indictable as tending to a breach of the peace; but the report does not show what is meant by the publication, whether it was published otherwise than by pleading or affidavit in court or not.

An affidavit in support of a summons, though defamatory as to a third person, is not actionable. Henderson v. Broomhead, 4 Hurlst. & N. 569.

Erle, J., said in respect to this affidavit that it did not appear certain that it was irrelevant. Other judges spoke generally as to the privilege of words used in judicial proceedings. But see Dawkins v. Rokeby, L. R. 7 H. L. 744, affg. 3 Q. B. 255.

An affidavit filed in support of a motion is privileged so far as it is pertinent, or believed to be so by the affiant upon reasonable grounds. Hyde v. McCabe, 100 Mo. 412.

A charge in an affidavit filed in opposition to a motion for security for costs to the effect that the person who made the affidavit in favor of the motion is a person alleging insolvency was corruptly guilty of willfully false swearing, is not sufficiently relevant to be privileged, and the belief in its relevancy, which can excuse the person who made it, is a question of fact. Ibid.

An affidavit showing cause against a rule nisi for criminal information for sending a challenge to a person who obtains the rule is privileged in setting forth any matters respecting the past conduct of such person as the affiant may think would disinculcate the court to favor the application. Doyle v. O'Doherty, Car. & M. 418.

Pertinent allegations in an affidavit were also held privileged in Astley v. Younge, 3 Burr. 807.

An affidavit that an attorney had disclosed confidential communications is relevant and therefore privileged, when presented in defense of a motion to strike out an allegation of the defendant in a suit for compensation, that the attorney's services were abortive and of no value. Garr v. Seiden, 4 N. Y. 91.

An affidavit volunteered for the purpose of inducing a governor to revoke a warrant issued to the agent of another state in proceedings for the rendition of a fugitive, being a proceeding coram non iudice, is not privileged. Hosmer v. Loveland, 19 Barb. 116.

An affidavit by a physician that a person is insane, made in a proceeding properly and legally instituted under the statute, is privileged, but it is otherwise with a certificate to that effect voluntarily made by a physician and not required or authorized by law. Perkins v. Mitchell, 81 Barb. 461.

An affidavit presented to a magistrate accusing a person of crime is privileged. Hartscock v. Red- and without malice or ill will towards plaintiff herein, and that such testimony was relevant to the issue involved in said suit.

The first assignment of error necessary for us to consider is that, as a part of plaintiff's case in chief, evidence in her behalf was admitted, tending to show that her general reputation for virtue and chastity was good. At the time this evidence was offered and admitted, no attack had been made by defendants, either in the pleadings or otherwise, upon the character of the plaintiff; and it was then and there stated by their counsel, in open court, and in the hearing of the jury, that her reputation for virtue and chastity was admitted to be of the best, and that no attack would be made thereon during the trial, nor was any such attack made. There is some conflict in the authorities as to whether, in an action for libel or slander, the plaintiff may give in evidence his good character, without it first having been attacked by the defendant either in the pleadings or evidence. "But the better opinion," says Mr. Wharton, "is against this concession, on the ground that the law presumes a party's character good, and that it is superfluous for him to prove that which is presumed." Whart. Ev. § 47. And again says the same author: "It would be manifestly improper to permit a party suing for damages to put in evidence, as reason why he should have heavy damages, that his character is good: First, the law assumes all characters to be good, and there is no use in proving that which is thus assumed; secondly, to make good character the basis of recovery would be equivalent to saying that a person with a bad character can be injured with impunity; thirdly, a collateral issue would be provoked, which would bear hard upon many deserving cases. For these and other reasons the courts have refused to permit such evidence to be put in." Section 50. This we think the better doctrine, and the one supported by the weight of authority. The law presumes the plaintiff's character to be good until it is attacked, and she may safely rest upon this presumption, and no evidence that she may offer can add to or increase its force or virtue. See Hitchcock v. Moore, 70 Mich. 112, and note, and 3 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 112, where the authorities are fully collated, and to which reference may be had by any one desiring to pursue the investigation.

The next assignment of error is in the instruction to the jury that "actual ill will or malice will enhance the damages, and may be shown for that purpose, but need not be shown to entitle the plaintiff to recover." This was manifest error, under all the authorities. While there is some conflict in the adjudged cases as to whether witnesses are absolutely exempt from liability to an action for defamatory words uttered or published in the course of judicial proceedings, it is agreed by all the authorities that they are presumptively so; and before a witness can be held liable in a civil action this presumption must be overcome, by showing affirmatively that such statements were not only false and malicious, but that they were not pertinent to the issues, and not in response to questions asked by counsel. It seems to be the settled doctrine of the English courts that statements made by a witness in the course of a judicial investigation are absolutely privileged, to that extent that no action for libel or slander will lie therefor.

dict, 6 Blackf. 256, 38 Am. Dec. 141; Sanders v. Rollinson, 2 Strobb. L. 447; Briggs v. Byrd, 34 N. C. 377.

In Sanders v. Rollinson the decision is put on the ground that the remedy, if any, is for malicious prosecution.

In Shock v. McChesney, 4 Yeates, 507, 2 Am. Dec. 415, also it was held that words charging a crime as the basis of an action by a justice of the peace are not the basis of an action for slander, although the defendant is discharged without an indictment, but the remedy is by malicious prosecution.

So an affidavit for a search warrant is held in Vause v. Lee, 1 Hill, L. 197, 26 Am. Dec. 168, not to create a liability for libel, because the remedy, if any, is for malicious prosecution.

And words spoken to a magistrate on application for a warrant for felony are not actionable, if spoken in good faith for the purpose of instituting proceedings. Bunton v. Worley, 4 Bibb, 88, 7 Am. Dec. 735.

So a complaint to the grand jury charging perjury cannot constitute an actionable libel. Kidder v. Parkhurst, 3 Allen, 383.

An affidavit charging perjury as the foundation of a warrant for an arrest is not the basis of an action for libel, even if false and malicious. Francis v. Wood, 75 Ga. 648.

But in Pierce v. Oard, 23 Neb. 323, it is held that reasonable and probable grounds for believing that a crime has been committed are necessary to create a privilege in statements charging a crime made on application to a magistrate for a warrant.

And a complaint to a magistrate of felony to obtain a warrant not made in belief of its truth, but 22 L. R. A.

for an ulterior private purpose, such as the enforcement of a personal claim, is held libelous. Hill v. Miles, 9 N. H. 14.

The exhibition of articles of peace to a magistrate, being a proceeding in a court of justice, is privileged. Cutler v. Dixon, 4 Co. Rep. 14.

So defamatory declarations to the magistrate in swearing articles of peace against a person were held privileged, even if malicious, although they could be used to show malice in slander made outside the court. Goslin v. Cannon, 1 Harr. (Del.) 3.

Words spoken in good faith to an officer for the purpose of giving a person accused into his custody, or in making a complaint to a magistrate, were held not actionable, in Johnson v. Evans, 8 Esp. 32.

Words spoken by the complainant in a criminal case, reiterating the charge when the parties are brought before the magistrate, made in answer to the defendant's questions, will be regarded as spoken in the judicial proceeding and subject to the privilege. Allen v. Crofoot, 2 Wend. 515, 20 Am. Dec. 647.

Although a person may be privileged in charging another with felony before a magistrate, he is liable for slander if he, before commencing the prosecution, stated the same charge to other persons and also repeated them after an acquittal of the person charged before the magistrate, whether the charges are made to those present at the examination or others. Burlingame v. Burlingame, 8 Cow. 141.

For libel by defamatory words in pleading, see note to Randall v. Hamilton (La.) ante, 649, B. A. R.

In this country, many, and perhaps a majority, of the courts have refused to adopt the absolute and unqualified privilege of a witness, as laid down by the English courts; but it is agreed that a witness is absolutely privileged as to everything said by him, having relation or reference to the subject-matter of inquiry before the court, or in response to questions asked by counsel, and presumptively so as to all his statements. But some of the cases hold that if he abuse his privilege by making false statements, which he knows to be impertinent and immaterial, and not responsive to questions propounded to him, for the purpose of malicious defamation, he may, upon an affirmative showing to that effect, be held in damages for libel or slander. Rice v. Coolidge, 121 Mass. 898, 23 Am. Rep. 279; White v. Carroll, 42 N. Y. 161, 1 Am. Rep. 508; Smith v. Howard, 28 Iowa, 51; Barnes v. McCrate, 82 Me. 442; Hutchinson v. Lewis, 75 Ind. 55; Cooley, Torts, 211; Newell, Defamation, Slander & Libel, 449; Hoar v. Wood, 8 Met. 193; Mower v. Watson, 11 Vt. 586, 84 Am. Dec. 704; Shadden v. McElwee, 86 Tenn. 146.

In Odgers on Libel and Slander (page 191), it is said: "A witness in the box is absolutely privileged in answering all the questions asked him by the counsel on either side; and, even if he volunteers an observation (a practice much to be discouraged), still, if it has reference to the matter in issue, or fairly arises out of any question asked him by counsel, though only going to his credit, such observation will also be privileged. But a remark made by a witness in the box, wholly irrelevant to the matter of inquiry, uncalled for by any question of counsel, and introduced by the witness maliciously, for his own purposes, would not be privileged, and would also, probably, be a contempt of court." So, also, in Hoar v. Wood, supra, Chief Justice Shaw said: "We take the rule to be well settled by the authorities that words spoken in the course of judicial proceedings, though they are such as impute crime to another, and therefore, if spoken elsewhere, would import malice, and be actionable in themselves, are not actionable, if they are applicable and pertinent to the subject of inquiry. The question, therefore, in such case, is not whether the words spoken are true, not whether they are actionable in themselves, but whether they were spoken in the course of judicial proceedings, and whether they were relative and pertinent to the cause or subject of inquiry." And in Mower v. Watson, supra, Mr. Chief Justice Redfield, after an extended examination of the authorities, says: "From the foregoing cases the true ground of the privilege is readily deduced. Prima facie, the party or his counsel is privileged for everything spoken in court. If any one considers himself aggrieved, in order to sustain an action for slander, he must show that the words spoken were not pertinent to the matter then in progress, and that they were spoken maliciously, and with a view to defame him. So that if the words spoken were pertinent to the matter in hand the party and counsel may claim full immunity from an action of slander, however malicious might have been his motive in speaking them. So, too, if the words were not pertinent to the matter in issue, yet if the party spoke them bona fide, believing them to be pertinent, no action of slander will lie. So that the plaintiff, in order to maintain this action, must prove—First, that the words spoken were not pertinent to the matter then in hand; and, secondly, that they were not spoken bona fide."

So that whether we adopt the rule as prevailing in England, or as modified by some of the courts of this country, it is apparent that under either view the instruction that proof of actual malice was not necessary to enable plaintiff to maintain this action was clearly erroneous. The words complained of were spoken by defendant when a witness in a judicial proceeding, in response to an interrogatory of counsel, and, under the rule most favorable to the plaintiff's contention, were presumptively privileged, and before this presumption can be overcome the plaintiff must show affirmatively that they "were not pertinent to the matter then in progress, and that they were spoken maliciously, and with a view to defame her."

We think it unnecessary to notice at this time the other assignments of error, and the judgment of the court below will be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

STATE of Oregon, Resp't.,
v.

A. J. ADAMS, Appt.

(.....Or.....)

Seduction accomplished on promise of marriage conditioned on pregnancy resulting is not within a statute making seduction under promise of marriage a criminal offense.

(December 26, 1898.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County convicting defendant of seduction under promise of marriage. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. M. L. Pipes for appellant.
Messrs. George E. Chamberlain, Atty-Gen., and W. T. Hume, Dist. Atty., for the State.

Bean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant brings this appeal from a judgment of conviction of the crime of seduc-

NOTE.—The above case seems to be very nearly novel and disapproves the only case cited on the subject. The court says it has been unable to find any other case in point. The decision is therefore an important addition to the law of the subject.

tion under promise of marriage. The evidence shows that the prosecutrix, who is about twenty-seven years of age, came to Portland in January, 1891, from Council Bluffs, in Iowa, where some two years before she had been acquainted and had kept company for a few months with defendant. In April or May after her arrival in Portland, she again met the defendant on several occasions at the home of a mutual friend, where she was accustomed to visit, and was frequently accompanied by him on her return after these visits to the place where she was working as a domestic. On one of these occasions, in either April or May, 1891, the defendant solicited her to go with him to Portland Heights, to which she first objected, but finally consented, and, after arriving at the end of the car line, they walked around the heights, and what occurred, as told in her own language, is that "he teased me and teased me until he induced me to give up to him. He said, if he hurt me in any way, he would see me through and marry me. If he got me in a family way, he would marry me. I told him my intention was not to marry at all. He promised, if he hurt me, if he got me in any different way, he would see me through, or see that I was cared for, and do what was right; promised just as much as to say, 'I will marry you.' Said he never would hurt me. He promised both before and after that, if he hurt me in any way, he would see me through, and see that I was taken care of; just as much as to say, 'I will marry you.'" The immoral relations thus established continued at frequent intervals until a few months before the trial, in July, 1893, and resulted in pregnancy, and the birth of a stillborn child on the 4th of May, 1893. The only evidence given on the trial of a promise of marriage or of the seduction was that of the prosecutrix, as above detailed, and which defendant contends is insufficient to prove the crime charged, because, as he contends, seduction accomplished under a promise of marriage, to be performed only on condition that pregnancy resulted from the intercourse, is not within the statute. The statute provides that "if any person, under promise of marriage, shall seduce and have illicit intercourse with any unmarried female of previous chaste character, such person, upon conviction, shall be punished, etc. And a subsequent marriage of the parties is a defense to the violation of this section."

It will be observed that mere illicit intercourse is not an offense under this statute, nor is seduction alone made a crime, but the seduction under a subsisting promise of marriage of an unmarried woman of previous chaste character. The gist of the offense is that the seduction shall be accomplished under or by means of a promise of marriage which is unfulfilled. Without the promise there can be no crime under this statute, however reprehensible the conduct of the man may be. A promise of marriage, and her reliance upon it, must be the means of inducing the woman to surrender her virtue. She must be drawn aside from the path of virtue she is then pursuing and induced to yield to the solicitations of her seducer, by means of and under the influence of a promise of marriage, upon the performance of which she in good faith had a right to rely. Nothing less will satisfy this statute. Its object is not to punish illicit intercourse, but the seducer who by means of a promise of marriage destroys the chastity of an unmarried female of previous chaste character, and who thus draws her aside from the path of virtue and rectitude, and then fails and refuses to fulfill his promise. It is, however, not necessary that the promise should be so technically valid as to sustain a civil action for breach of promise; and although it may be conditioned upon immediate intercourse, thus rendering it void in a civil proceeding, because founded upon an immoral consideration, it is still held sufficient to sustain a criminal prosecution if the woman in good faith relied upon it and was thereby deceived. Kenyon v. People, 26 N. Y. 208, 84 Am. Dec. 177; Boyce v. People, 55 N. Y. 644; Callahan v. State, 63 Ind. 198, 80 Am. Rep. 211; People v. De Fore, 64 Mich. 698. In such case, the mutual promise of the woman is implied from her yielding to the solicitations of her seducer under his promise of marriage and the promise becomes absolute. But when the seduction is accomplished by means of a promise of marriage, to be performed only upon the condition that the intercourse results in pregnancy, no promise of the woman can be implied from such yielding, and it seems to us the contract smacks too much of a corrupt and licentious bargain to fall within the statute. How can it be claimed that a pure-minded woman is led astray and her ruin accomplished under a promise of marriage which, with her assent, amounts to nothing more than a mutual agreement to engage in illicit relations so long as pregnancy does not result, and which neither party expects nor intends shall be fulfilled except upon the happening of an event which may never occur? Take the case of a woman who yields under a promise of marriage by a married man, to be performed on the death of his wife, could it be seriously contended that such a case would be within the statute? And yet it is difficult to conceive any difference in principle between the case suggested and the one at bar. The statute is not intended as an act to punish a man who prevails upon a woman to gratify his lust by a promise of marriage of such a character. Its plain object is to protect the innocent and confiding from being betrayed, and surrendering to her destroyer all that is estimable in woman, under the belief, based upon what she supposes to be an honorable proposal of marriage, to be performed in any event, that to yield is but to anticipate the time when the act will be lawful. Its design is to protect the chaste woman from the assaults of a wicked and designing man, who makes use of the most potent of all seductive arts to win the love and confidence of a woman by professions of love and marriage, and not one who is willing to gratify her own lustful desires, stipulating only that, if her shame is likely to become exposed, it shall be shielded by marriage. It recognizes that a woman, confiding in what she supposes to be an honorable promise of a future marriage, and relying upon it, is peculiarly defenseless against the solicitations and persuasions of him to whom she is betrothed, and has consequently provided for the punishment of him who, by means of such a promise, is guilty of betraying that confidence to the utter ruin and disgrace of the female, and the scandal of society. It was passed in the interest of good morals, and not as a cover for licentiousness. The words, "under promise of marriage, seduce," it seems to us, manifestly contemplate that the seduction must be accomplished by means of an absolute promise of marriage, or one which becomes absolute the moment the woman yields. Any other construction would defeat the purpose of the statute, and render it a cover for licentiousness. In this case the improper relations continued between the prosecutrix and defendant, apparently without objection on her part, for more than a year after she is alleged to have been seduced, and yet during all that time there was no subsisting promise of marriage. The defendant, under such circumstances, was guilty of no crime for which he could be punished under the statute, for the condition upon which his promise was to be performed had not happened, and there was consequently no broken promise for which he could be punished. The object of the statute is not to punish a man who seduces a woman, and then marries her, but to punish one who uses the promise as a means of inducing the woman to submit to his lustful desires, and, after his purpose is accomplished, abandons his victim to her disgrace and shame. If the prosecutrix was seduced at all, it was at the time the first connection took place, but there was no promise of marriage then, for the contingency upon which it was to become absolute did not happen until long after, and consequently the promise did not precede the intercourse, which is essential to constitute the crime. The only case cited, or which we have been able to find, on the question presented by this record, is People v. Hustis, 82 Hun, 58, in which two of the three judges of the second department of the supreme court of the state of New York, in a very brief opinion, held that seduction accomplished under a promise of marriage conditioned on pregnancy resulting thereafter is within a statute similar to ours. This decision seems to have been based upon the proposition that the question had already been decided by the court of appeals in Kenyon v. People, supra, and in Boyce v. People, supra; but neither of these cases go to the extent of holding the doctrine for which they are cited, but only that a promise of marriage on condition of immediate intercourse is sufficient, because the law implies a mutual promise by the woman from her yielding, and, the condition being thereby fulfilled, the promise becomes absolute. But when the promise is conditional, depending on pregnancy, the condition may never happen, and consequently the defendant may never be under any obligation to marry the prosecutrix. He is not under a promise to marry at the time of the seduction, and may in fact never be. And hence it seems to us the cases referred to do not sustain the doctrine announced in People v. Hustis, and we are unwilling to regard that case as controlling authority.

This conclusion renders unnecessary an examination of any of the other questions raised on this appeal, and the judgment of the court below is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for such further proceedings as are not inconsistent with this opinion.

thereof or removal therefrom" such officer shall deliver papers and books to his successor, especially since the city attorney is by law subject to removal.

4. Power to remove a city counselor is not inherent in the common council of a city where the appointment of the counselor for a definite term is given to the mayor absolutely without providing for his removal.

(January 5, 1894.)

APPLICATION for a writ of prohibition to prevent the defendants from proceeding with an investigation of charges preferred against petitioner for the purpose of having him removed from the office of counselor to the city of Detroit. Writ granted and motion to vacate denied.

Messrs. Hoyt Post and John D. Conely, for relator:

The power of suspension and removal referred to in chapter 4 covers all officers appointed or elected under the charter of 1893. The conferring of express authority in relation to a certain subject excludes any implication that a different and additional authority exists not fairly within the limits of the terms in which the express authority is conferred.

Although the power to remove a corporate officer from his office for reasonable and just cause is one of the common-law incidents of all corporations, it is universally held that it is a power which is possessed only by the whole body of corporators which can only be exercised by any representative body or committee, like directors, trustees, or the common council, or anything short of the whole body of corporators, when it has been expressly delegated to them by the whole body or by the charter.

The power of removal is not the exercise of a legislative function but is in its essence of a judicial character.

Dullam v. Willson, 58 Mich. 392, 51 Am. Rep. 128; Stockwell v. White Lake Twp. Board, 22 Mich. 341; People v. Stuart, 74 Mich. 411.

The exercise of the power of removal of an officer being of a judicial nature, while all the formalities of court need not be observed, the essential requisites of judicial procedure must be observed.

Dullam v. Willson, and People v. Stuart, supra.

It may be fairly presumed as to all of the matters charged excepting as to the occurrence on the 14th of October, that they all transpired during the petitioner's former term of office. As such they are not the subject of charges for misconduct during his present term and he cannot now be removed therefor.

State v. Jersey City, 25 N. J. L. 536; Com. v. Shaver, 8 Watts & S. 333.

The trial body in case of removal for cause must consist of all the officers in whom the power of removal is vested. He cannot be tried by a committee of the common council.

Jacksonville v. Allen, 25 Ill. App. 54; Andreus v. King, 77 Me. 224.

Messrs. Jasper C. Gates and Charles Flowers, with Mr. Edwin F. Conely for defendants.

Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The relator, Speed, was duly appointed city counselor and head of the department of law in the city of Detroit, July 16, 1893, and entered upon the duties of the office. This appointment was made under Act No. 419 of the Local Acts of 1893, entitled "An Act Supplementary to the Charter of the City of Detroit, and to Provide for a Law Department of Said City." Under the decision in Speed v. Detroit, 97 Mich. 198 (rendered Oct. 27, 1893), Mr. Speed's appointment was declared valid, and the council directed to approve his bond. Thereafter the mayor of the city lodged charges with the common council against Mr. Speed, for which he asked said council to remove him. The council appointed a committee to investigate these charges, whereupon the relator filed this petition, asking for the writ of prohibition against the procedure of the council. The writ was granted, subject, however, to a motion to vacate it on cause shown. The respondents made answer to the petition, and moved to vacate the order. The principal question in the case is the power of the council to remove the city counselor for cause, but two preliminary matters will be first determined.

1. It is suggested, rather than seriously insisted, by the learned counsel for the respondents, that the writ of prohibition does not lie in the present case, for the reason that the common council was proceeding in a political or administrative way, rather than in any other. They cite Mechem, Pub. Off. 1019, 1020; High, Extr. Legal Rem. 783, 769; Burch v. Hardwicke, 28 Gratt. 51; People v. Lake County Dist. Ct. 6 Colo. 534; Smith v. Whitney, 116 U. S. 167, 29 L. ed. 601. The rule laid down by these learned authors is that the writ lies only to prevent the unauthorized exercise by courts and officers of judicial powers, and does not lie to restrain executive or ministerial action; and the authorities above cited, together with others, are cited in support of the proposition. In People v. Lake County Dist. Ct. the power to remove for certain causes was expressly conferred upon the city council of Leadville. No doubt, therefore, existed of the jurisdiction of the council in the matter. In Burch v. Hardwicke, the power was also expressly conferred by the charter upon the mayor to suspend or remove officers for misconduct in office or neglect of duty. In Smith v. Whitney, the writ was invoked to prohibit the secretary of the navy, and a general court martial of naval officers, to try the relator upon charges which had been preferred against him. In all these cases the respondents were proceeding under the express authority of law, and they are therefore clearly inapplicable to the present case. The writ lies "to prohibit the exercise by an inferior tribunal or officer of judicial powers with which he is not legally vested," and "to prevent actions in excess of the jurisdiction conferred by law, and not to regulate or control the manner in which a lawful jurisdiction shall be exercised." Mechem, Pub. Off. 1013, 1014.

Under the constitution the legislature may provide for the removal of municipal officers. It certainly has never been regarded in this state that the officer or body upon whom this power is conferred acts in a purely political, administrative, or legislative capacity. Such officer or body acts, and must of necessity act, in a quasi judicial capacity, and the method of procedure must be of quasi judicial character. Stockwell v. White Lake Twp. Board, 22 Mich. 341; Dullam v. Willson, 53 Mich. 392, 51 Am. Rep. 178; People v. Stuart, 74 Mich. 411; Fuller v. Ellis (Mich.) 57 N. W. Rep. 33. Such officer or body then becomes an inferior tribunal, amenable to the writ of prohibition, when acting in exercise of the jurisdiction conferred. In such cases it is of little consequence what name is given to the power conferred. The name cannot relieve it of its essential character. It would be a reproach to the law if it did not provide a speedy remedy by which such tribunals can be prohibited from the exercise of an excess of authority, or of an authority which they do not possess. We are of the opinion that the writ lies in the present case. State v. Duluth (Minn.) 55 N. W. Rep. 118; People v. Cooper, 57 How. Pr. 416; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 253.

2. While it appeared, upon the argument, to be conceded that the sufficiency of the charges is not here in issue, still we deem it proper to say that the charges preferred, so far as they relate to the acts of Mr. Speed committed before his appointment to, and induction into, this office, are clearly beyond the jurisdiction of the respondents to determine. There is no provision in the constitution nor in the laws which prevents a person from holding office for misconduct in another office which he held prior to the one to which he was elected or appointed. We have been unable to find any authority which justifies a removal for such previous misconduct. The misconduct for which any officer may be removed must be found in his acts and conduct in the office from which his removal is sought, and must constitute a legal cause for his removal, and affect the proper administration of the office. There is no restriction upon the power of the people to elect, or the appointing power to appoint, any citizen to office, notwithstanding his previous character, habits, or official misconduct. State v. Jersey City, 25 N. J. L. 536; Com. v. Shaver, 3 Watts & S. 388. In Com. v. Shaver it was held that the trial, conviction, and sentence of a sheriff for the offense of bribing a voter previously to his election to the office did not disqualify him. In State v. Jersey City it was held that the expulsion of an alderman for receiving bribes did not disqualify him for election to the same office. See also State v. Duluth, supra; Crawford v. Scio and Webster Twp. Boards, 24 Mich. 248; Richards v. Clarkburg, 30 W. Va. 502; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 252, and note; State v. Jersey City, 25 N. J. L. 536. This may be a proper subject for legislative consideration, but, until the legislature shall choose to disqualify persons from holding office for such reasons, they can constitute no cause for removal. It was settled in the case of Speed v. Detroit, supra, that the mayor could not revoke the appointment when once made, and that neither he nor the common council possessed the power to remove at will. That case was ably argued, and received the most careful examination by this court. We see no occasion to change our views, or to question the soundness of the conclusions then reached. Counsel for respondents, in their brief upon the application for a rehearing, concede that "there is no provision whatever for the removal of an appointive officer upon charges, nor for the trial of such charges;"

but they contend (1) that the power of removal is necessarily implied from the language used in the Acts of 1893; and (2) that the power of removal for cause is implied from the charter and from the nature of the municipal organization. The only reference to removal from office in the Act of 1893 is found in section 8, which reads as follows: "Upon the expiration of the term of office of the city counselor and the city attorney, or their resignation thereof or removal therefrom, such officer shall forthwith, on demand, deliver to his successor in office all deeds, leases, contracts, and other papers and books in his hands belonging to the corporation, or delivered to him by the corporation or any of its officers, and all papers in actions prosecuted or defended by him, or which are pending and undetermined." From this language it is argued that the power of removal for cause is necessarily implied, and the case of State v. Somers (Neb.) 53 N. W. Rep. 146, is cited in support of the proposition. The provision of the statute of Nebraska then before the court for construction reads as follows: "Said commissioner of health shall be appointed by the mayor, subject to the approval of a majority of the council, and shall hold office for a term of two years from the date of appointment, unless sooner removed or retired." This statute was amended so as to read as follows: "All officers appointed by the mayor and confirmed by the council shall hold the office to which they may be appointed until the end of the mayor's term of office and until their successors are appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed or the ordinance creating the office shall be repealed, except as otherwise provided in section 104." Construing these provisions together, it was held that the right of removal was impliedly retained in the hands of the mayor, not in the council. The difference between the two statutes is apparent. In that case the appointment was until the end of the mayor's term, unless sooner removed, while, in the present case, section 2 of the Act conferring the power of appointment is as follows: "He (the city counselor and the head of the legal department of the city) shall be appointed by the mayor on or before the third Tuesday in June for the term of three years from the 1st day of July next succeeding his appointment." In State v. Somers the clause in regard to removal is coupled directly with the appointment, in the same section, and no other object than the removal of the officer is apparent from the language. But in this case it is obvious that the sole purpose of section 8 is to provide for a surrender of the books and papers to their proper custodian in the event of a lawful successor to the office, and it is fairly to be inferred that this purpose was in the legislative mind in adopting the enactment. Any other conclusion would do violence to the rules of construction. This act was supplementary to the charter of the city of Detroit, and its sole object was the creation of a new department. It is, in its character, an independent act, and, in the absence of controlling language referring to the charter, the language of the act must prevail. The character of this department and the office of the city counselor will be referred to hereafter. There would be more force in this proposition of counsel if there were no officer mentioned in the act to which the term "removal" might apply, but the city attorney is elected, and, under the express provisions of the charter, may be removed "for corrupt or willful malfeasance or misfeasance in office, or for willful neglect of duty, upon charges which must be tried, and to which the officer shall have the right to make his defense." Charter, § 18. This act recognizes the city attorney in his status as an elective officer, and therefore the provisions of the charter to his motion apply. But, as to the city counselor and the head of the legal department, he is a new officer created by the act, to be appointed under the act, whose duties are specifically defined by it, whose term of office is fixed, and whose appointment is lodged solely in the mayor. If the Nebraska case were applicable to the facts of this case, it would follow that the power of motion was lodged in the mayor to remove at will, and this question has been decided in Speed v. Detroit, supra.

Is the power to remove the city counselor appointed under this act inherent in the municipal corporation or in its governing body, the common council? Judge Dillon, in his valuable work on Municipal Corporations (sec. 181; Id. 4th ed. § 242), states that the question of implied removal by municipal corporations has not been judicially settled in this country, and ventures the opinion that, in the absence of any express or implied restrictions in the charter, such power exists. It is also stated in the opinion in Richards v. Clarksburg, 30 W. Va. 496, which is largely relied on by respondents' counsel, decided in 1887, that the court was unable to find a single case in the United States where this question has been decided. The charter, in that case, appears to have been entirely silent in regard to the removal of officers, and particular stress seems to have been laid upon the broad powers conferred by the statutes of West Virginia upon the common councils of towns and villages. Under the facts of this case, however, we are not required to enter upon an extended discussion or determination of this question. The tendency of the decisions in this country is to regard municipal corporations as an aid to the state government, and to limit their powers to those which are expressly derived from the constitution and from legislative enactments, and to those implied powers only which are necessary to carry out the powers thus conferred. The highest tribunal in this country has declared the well-established rule on this subject in Ottawa v. Carey, 108 U. S. 121, 27 L. ed. 674. Chief Justice Waite, speaking for the court in that case, said: "Municipal corporations are created to aid the state government in the regulation and administration of local affairs. They have only such powers of government as are expressly granted to them, or such powers as are necessary to carry into effect those that are granted. No powers can be implied, except such as are essential to the objects and purposes of the corporation as created and established." See also, Taylor v. Bay City Street R. Co., 80 Mich. 77; People v. Huribut, 24 Mich. 69, 9 Am. Rep. 108. In this last case Justice Christy said: "But the common council of the city is not the city, nor the legal entity known as the corporation of the city. It is itself but a public board for municipal purposes, with just such powers (not forbidden by the constitution) as the legislature have thought, or may hereafter think, proper to confer." In discussing the power of a common council to expel a member, the supreme court of New Jersey recognized the power of a corporation at common law to expel a member for sufficient cause, and in its opinion said: "But the jurisdiction exercised in this case is not derived from the common law. The common council is not the corporation, and, whatever powers a municipal corporation may have to remove or expel a member for cause at common law, it is clear that the corporation itself has not by any by-law delegated any of them to the common council, and that body, therefore, cannot avail itself of the common-law jurisdiction vested as an inherent right in the corporation itself to expel a member of their own body. The council derives its jurisdiction from the charter of the corporation." It is argued that the power of removal of the city counselor is necessary in order to protect the interests of the city from an incompetent or corrupt incumbent, and therefore it must be inferred that the legislature recognized this power as existing. Courts may not surmise or speculate as to legislative enactments. With the reasons for conferring or withholding a power the courts have no concern. They must interpret the statute as they find it. The same argument was made in People v. Woodruff, 32 N. Y. 355. After stating the serious consequences which it was claimed would be entailed upon the community under the interpretation given, the court said: "To obviate these alarming and startling results it is contended that we are to imply and infer an intent on the part of the legislature to have the power lodged in the comptroller, in the first instance, remain with and to be exercised by him whenever the exigency should arise which might call for it. It is a dangerous principle to imply power when it is not conferred by legislative authority in clear and distinct terms. It is always competent for the legislature to speak clearly and without equivocation, and it is safer for the judicial department to follow the plain intent and obvious meaning of the act, rather than to speculate upon what might have been the views of the legislature in the emergency which may have arisen. It is wiser and safer to leave to the legislative department to supply a supposed or actual casus omissus than attempt to do it by judicial construction."

The position, character, and duties of the officer created by the act are important considerations upon the principle under discussion. He is required to be an attorney of five years' practice, to give a bond of $5,000 for the faithful performance of his duties, and to devote his entire time to the duties of the office. He must therefore abandon all his other legal business. He is made the legal adviser, not only of the common council, but of all the other departments of the city government and the boards thereof, except the board of police commissioners. It is apparent that the legislature contemplated that a man of high standing and character in his profession should be appointed to this important position. Is it reasonable to infer that the legislature intended to place this important office beyond the control or fear of any other department? That such a man should become incompetent, corrupt, and neglectful of his duties would be an exception to the rule. If it be said that the exception might arise, it may likewise be said that in the change of administrations, when the political complexion of the common council might change, false charges might be made for political purposes in order to remove the incumbent, and replace him by another of the same political faith as the council. Experience has demonstrated that there is at least as much danger of the one as of the other. These considerations may have had weight with the legislature. The reasons for a fixed term without the power to remove may have had greater weight with legislators than the risk of malfeasance or misfeasance on the part of the officer. They may well have deemed it important that the head of such a department should be free from all fear of removal or interference on the part of the common council. If, however, it was casus omissus on the part of the legislature, it is one which the legislature and not the courts must supply.

No support for the position of respondents can, we think, be found in the charter itself. The subject of removals is completely covered by its provisions, and excludes removals in any other manner than is there provided. Elective officers, with few exceptions, can be removed for cause. This, under the well-established rule, excludes the power to remove at will. Certain appointive officers, under the charter, can be removed at will

"without charges or trial." Charter, § 19. This likewise excludes the power to remove for cause. Where the power to remove at will is given, the law does not contemplate that the officer may be put to the expense of a trial for cause, and have charges of official misconduct placed before the public. Dill. Mun. Corp. § 245; State v. Jersey City, 23 N. J. L. 538; Speed v. Detroit, supra, and authorities there cited; State v. Somers, supra; Crawford v. Seio and Webster Twp. Boards, 24 Mich. 248.

In People v. Ingham County Treasurer, 36 Mich. 416, it is said: "The general statute concerning removals contains no provision applicable to superintendents of the poor. Hence, there would seem to be no provision for the removal of these officers except the specific regulation in the supervisors' act. It would seem that the legislature meant to confer on the supervisors a power to remove on the two specified grounds, but had no intention to give the right on any other ground, or to delegate to the supervisors a discretionary general power to remove. The provision in the supervisors' act, in so far as it applies to superintendents of the poor, would be rendered entirely gratuitous if a general authority to remove were to be implied, or should be considered as a consequence of the power to appoint." It is also significant that the act gives the common council no voice, either in the appointment or confirmation of the city counselor. The absolute authority and the entire responsibility of his appointment are given to the mayor without power of removal at will or for a cause. There is nothing in the act which shows any intention on the part of the legislature to confer such power upon the common council; nor do we think such power is inherent in the council, which is the governing body of the municipal corporation, and derives its powers from express legislative enactment.

The motion to vacate the order must therefore be denied, with costs.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

Cyrus B. BAIRD, Plff. in Err.,
v.

Lewis B. HOWARD.

(51 Ohio St. —.)

*1. Where possession of personal property has been obtained by means of a contract made with one who, by reason of his intoxication, was without capacity to enter into a valid agreement, and the person obtaining the property knew of the other's incapacity when the contract was made, the transaction is fraudulent: The party thus deprived of his property may regard the possession as wrongful; and if the possessor claims, or exercises dominion over the property, to the exclusion of the right of the other, the latter, at his election, may treat the transaction as a conversion of the property, and the institution of an action to recover the value of the property so converted constitutes such an election.

*Headnotes by the COURT.

NOTE.—As to the right of a person to recover for property obtained from him by fraudulent purchase, without formal rescission of the invalid contract or returning the consideration that he may have received, the above case is somewhat analogous to a replevin suit by such a defrauded vendor. As to replevin in such a case, without returning consideration, see note to Sisson v. Hill (R. L.) 21 L. R. A. 206.

2. In such case no formal rescission of the invalid contract is necessary before bringing the action; and if the consideration, in whole or in part, has been paid to the party deprived of his property, no offer to return it is necessary to enable him to maintain the action, but the measure of damages will be the difference between the value of the property delivered and consideration received.

3. In such case, upon the trial of an issue respecting the capacity of a party, by reason of his intoxication, to enter into a contract, it is competent to introduce, in his behalf, evidence of declarations, respecting the value of the property, made by him recently before the contract was made, while he was sober.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to set aside a contract by which plaintiff sold to defendant certain property, on the ground that at the time of the transaction he was so intoxicated as to be incapacitated to do business.

Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

A contract made in such a state of intoxication as to deprive the party of his discretion and ordinary judgment will be set aside in equity, although the other party had no agency in producing the intoxication.

A drunkard is not incompetent like an idiot or one generally insane. He is simply incompetent upon proof that at the time of the act challenged his understanding was clouded or his reason dethroned by actual intoxication.

A contract made by one who is drunk, or of unsound mind, so as to be incapable of understanding its effect while not void is generally voidable at his option.

Intoxication to such an extent as to deprive a contracting party of the use of his reason has in many cases been treated as a temporary insanity, having the same effect upon a contract entered into during its continuance as if arising from any other cause.

The law requires two persons at least to make a contract. If Baird was entirely incapacitated, by reason of intoxication, to make a contract, then there never was a valid contract between Baird and Howard, and which Baird could elect to repudiate for fraud or affirm it. But Baird could not afterwards ratify it and keep the $1,000 and claim $600 by way of damages. Or, in other words, say he was sober and the contract good for $1,000, and that he was intoxicated and incapacitated for $600.

Bradbury, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, now plaintiff in error, set forth his claim in the court of common pleas in an amended petition as follows: "The plaintiff now comes and by leave of the court, first had and obtained, and files this his amended petition in this case, and says: That on the 18th day of August, A. D. 1886, the plaintiff was intoxicated to such an extent, that by reason thereof he was totally unable and unfit to make or enter into a valid contract of any kind. That the defendant, then well knowing the condition of the plaintiff, and that he was then intoxicated to such an extent that he was wholly unfit and unable by reason thereof to make or enter into a valid or binding contract, and then intending to cheat and defraud the plaintiff, bargained with, and then induced and procured the plaintiff, while so intoxicated, to sell and deliver to him, the defendant, the undivided one-half interest in all the livery stock, consisting of horses, carriages, harness, whips, robes and all other property then owned by the plaintiff and one Jerome T. Baird as partners under the firm name of Baird & Son. That said undivided one-half interest in said livery stock, so sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant, was then of the value of $1,600; yet the defendant, then well knowing that the said undivided one-half interest in said livery stock was of the value of $1,600, and then intending to cheat and defraud the plaintiff, induced and procured the plaintiff, while so intoxicated as aforesaid, to sell and deliver said undivided one-half interest in said livery stock to the defendant for the sum of $1,000 and no more; and while so intoxicated and intending to cheat and defraud the plaintiff, the defendant caused and procured the plaintiff to enter into a written contract between him and the plaintiff wherein and whereby it appears that the plaintiff sold and delivered said one undivided half interest in said livery stock to the defendant for the sum of $1,000 and no more. The plaintiff says that if he had been sober and capable of transacting such business on said 18th day of August, 1886, he would not have entered into said written contract with the defendant, and would not have then sold and delivered his said undivided one-half interest in said livery stock to the defendant for less than $1,600 cash. That his said undivided one-half interest in said livery stock was then worth the sum of $1,600 cash, and that the sum of $1,000, the amount paid by the defendant to the plaintiff therefor at the time and in the manner aforesaid, was a grossly inadequate price and consideration therefor and the defendant then well knew it. That the defendant then well knew that $1,000 was a grossly inadequate price and consideration for the said undivided one-half of said livery stock, and then knew that if the plaintiff was sober and capable of transacting such business as that of selling and disposing of his interest in said livery stock, that the plaintiff would not then have accepted the sum of $1,000 as a full consideration for his interest in said livery stock, which he had sold and delivered to defendant as aforesaid, but intending to cheat and defraud the plaintiff, the defendant purchased from the plaintiff, the said interest in said livery stock for the sum of $1,000 as in the manner aforesaid, and which stock the plaintiff then delivered to defendant. The plaintiff says that by reason of the premises he has been cheated, wronged, and defrauded by the defendant out of the sum of $600.

"The plaintiff therefore prays judgment against the defendant for the sum of six hundred dollars with interest from August 18, 1886."

To this petition a demurrer was interposed by the defendant, which the court of common pleas overruled, and to which ruling the defendant excepted. An issue of fact was then joined between the parties, upon the trial of which the plaintiff offered to prove the price that he had placed upon the livery stock before the sale, while sober. The defendant objected to its admission; his objection being overruled and the evidence admitted, he entered an exception thereto. It was upon these two grounds that the circuit court reversed the judgment; that court holding that the amended petition, as above set forth, did not disclose a cause of action, and that evidence of the value the plaintiff had, while sober, placed upon the property just previous to the sale was not admissible.

1. In support of the holding of the circuit court that the amended petition did not state a cause of action, counsel contends that plaintiff's only remedy was to rescind the contract, which he could accomplish in either of two ways: 1, by a suit in equity; 2, by an offer to return the consideration he had received, coupled with a demand for the restoration of his own property, after which, if the defendant did not consent to a restoration, an action in replevin, or in trover would lie. That these remedies were open to the plaintiff is apparent, and is in fact admitted by his counsel; but he contends for still another, namely the right, without a prior formal rescission of the contract, to maintain an action to recover the difference between the value of the property and the price received. Such an action could not be regarded as being on the contract; for instituting an action directly on the contract would be an affirmation of it, and if the contract should be affirmed he could not recover; for, according to its terms, he had been fully paid. The institution of such an action might be regarded, perhaps, as a rescission; but if the defendant's possession was rightful, up to the moment of the filing of the petition, the principle upon which that possession would be instantly transformed into a wrongful one, is not very apparent. If its unlawful character grew out of the rescission, the defendant should have been afforded an opportunity to restore the property before being held a wrongdoer. If, however, the method by which the defendant obtained possession was wrongful, there would be consistency in holding the possession thus obtained to have been wrongful at its inception.

The petition avers that the defendant, with intent to cheat and defraud the plaintiff, induced the latter to enter into the contract under consideration, and to deliver to the defendant the property involved in the controversy, with knowledge that the plaintiff was "unfit and unable to make or enter into a valid contract," because his senses were dulled by intoxication. The demurrer admitted this to be true. It thus appeared not merely that a contract had been made, but that the defendant had secured the possession of the plaintiff's property by knowingly taking advantage of the latter's temporary incapacity. Had possession been taken while the plaintiff's senses were overcome by sleep, no one would deny that such a possession was wrongful. The difference between the character of a possession secured by the latter method, and one deliberately obtained through the medium of an invalid contract, made with one whose senses the possessor knew at the time were stupefied by excessive intoxication, is one of degree rather than principle. That in the former case the transaction would involve a trespass, and present none of the features peculiar to contracts, while in the latter case it took the form of a contract, is a distinction possessing little if any materiality in this connection. The fraud inhering in the one, should be deemed a substantial equivalent to the force involved in the other, method of obtaining possession. Each is wrongful. To secure the possession of property by means of a contract made with its owner, by one who at the time knew him to be incapable of entering into a contract, constitutes a fraud.

In such case, it is true, a contract exists which the incapacitated party has an option to affirm or rescind. But because the one party may exercise this option, it does not follow that the other party may compel its exercise as a condition precedent to obtaining any relief. If, when restored to capacity, the former is satisfied with the contract, and wished to enforce its provisions, he can affirm and maintain an action upon it; if he had, in fact, received a substantial part of the consideration secured to him by the contract, and wished to recover possession of the property with which he had been induced to part, he should be required to rescind the contract and restore that part of the consideration which had been paid him, for he should not be allowed to retain the latter and at the same time recover possession of the former.

Where one person, ignorant of the incapacity of another person deals with the latter and obtains possession of his property, the possession of the former should not be deemed wrongful until the contract was rescinded and a demand for the property made upon him. The mutual rights or liabilities of persons thus situated, however, should not be the measure of the rights and liabilities of parties, where the possession of the property of one has been wrongfully obtained by the other. The wrongful acts by which possession was secured became material factors in determining the question. If a possession thus obtained is continued under circumstances from which it may be fairly inferred that the party in possession is exercising dominion over the property to the exclusion of the right of the party wrongfully dispossessed, the latter may regard such acts as constituting a conversion of the property.

We have found no case in all respects similar to the one under consideration, but in a number of well-considered cases, courts have held that where the purchase of goods has been effected by false representations the vendor may maintain trover against the vendee without demand. Thurston v. Blanchard, 22 Pick. 18, 83 Am. Dec. 700; Green v. Russell, 5 Hill, 188; Thompson v. Rose, 16 Conn. 71, 41 Am. Dec. 121; Noble v. Adams, 7 Taunt. 59; Bristol v. Wilmore, 2 Dowl. & R. 755.

In the procedure prescribed by our civil code all the ancient common-law actions are abolished; all are merged into one "civil action", and even if the facts stated in the petition did not disclose a technical conversion they constitute fraud to the injury of the plaintiff, as we have seen. The remedy should be as broad as the injury. The party guilty of the fraud should not be allowed to shield himself by a contract procured in this way and insist upon immunity for the fraud until the contract has been formally rescinded.

2. The principal dispute between the parties at the trial in the court of common pleas related to the competency of the plaintiff to make a contract at the time the one in contention was entered into. One means of ascertaining this, was to contrast him, as he conducted and expressed himself on that day, with himself as, according to his conduct, his opinions and expressions, he appeared on other days when known to be duly sober. That a few days before the sale, at a time when he was sober, he had placed upon the property a value that widely varied from that at which it was sold, reflected upon the extent that his judgment had been affected by the liquor he had drank.

That such evidence might be considered by the jury for some other and improper purpose, as, for instance, in determining the value of the property and the damages, does not render its admission erroneous. If competent for any purpose it was admissible.

Whenever it becomes necessary to inquire into the mental condition of a person, and there are other issues in the cause, much evidence is usually admitted which, but for that issue, would be incompetent; and in such cases the court, upon the request of a party, should caution the jury to limit its effect to the issue to which it is lawfully applicable.

The charge of the court is not printed in the record; but we should presume that the trial court did its duty, and therefore either limited to its proper office the evidence objected to, or if requested by the defendant, would have done so.

Judgment of the Circuit Court reversed and that of the Common Pleas affirmed.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

BARNES SAFE & LOCK CO., Plff. in Err.,

v.

BLOCH BROS. TOBACCO CO.

(..... W. Va.)

1. If a contract of agency is entered into, and the principal agrees to furnish to the agent on consignment certain manufactured articles, at a stipulated price, to be paid for when sold, such articles, when so furnished, remain the property of the principal until sold to a bona fide purchaser, and they cannot be executed and sold to pay the debts of the agent, and, if so sold, the purchaser gets no title to any such articles as against such principal.

2. The agent's right to a lien for commission and expenditures is one personal to himself, not transferable, and he alone has the right to take advantage of it.

NOTE.—Reservation of title in bailments for sale, as against creditors of bailor and bailee.

Conditional sales of goods to be resold.

Generally a wholesale dealer furnishing goods on a contract that the title should not pass until the goods are paid for will be protected as against the creditors of the party receiving the same. Rogers v. Whitehouse, 71 Me. 222; Powell v. Preston, 1 Hun, 513.

Each case must largely depend, however, on the particular wording of the contract and the circumstances under which it was made.

And the same was held where a purchaser in good faith bought out an entire stock of the retailer. Burbank v. Crooker, 7 Gray, 168, 66 Am. Dec. 470.

So where goods are held by a peddler on a contract of sale, he to account for all goods sold, the goods unsold are not liable for his debts. Mores v. Stone, 5 Barb. 516.

So the title does not pass in a contract appointing a party an agent to sell machines, the agent guaranteeing the payment for all machines, and to pay for all unsold machines at the end of the contract, in good notes, the machines to remain the property of the shipper until paid for under the contract. South Bend Iron Works v. Cottrell, 81 Fed. Rep. 254; Conable v. Lynch, 45 Iowa, 84.

And wherever the property of the principal can be specifically distinguished from that of the factor the right of the principal shall prevail over the possession of the latter. Price v. Ralston, 2 Dall. 60, 1 Am. Dec. 280.

And where liquor was furnished to a retail dealer on a contract to pay for all sold, and the profits of the retail trade to belong to him, the losses to be borne by him, and all unsold beer to be returned, the title did not pass so as to subject the beer held by the retailer to his debts. Meldrum v. Snow, 9 Pick. 441, 20 Am. Dec. 438; Lewis v. McCabe, 49 Conn. 141, 44 Am. Rep. 217; Mack v. Story, 57 Conn. 407.

contract of agency with the Globe Contract Company as follows, to wit:

"Articles of agreement between the Barnes Safe & Lock Company, of Pittsburgh, Pa., composed of Thomas Barnes, of the first part, and the Globe Contract Company, of Wheeling, W. Va., a corporation of the state of West Virginia, of the second part, witnesseth, that, for and in consideration of the party of the second part assuming the agency for the manufactures of the party of the first part in the territory hereinafter mentioned, the party of the first part hereby agrees that the party of the second part shall have the privilege of selling their fire and burglar proof safes, vault doors, etc., in the city of Wheeling, W. Va.; also throughout the state of West Virginia; also in Green, Fayette, and Washington counties, in the state of Pennsylvania; and also in Belmont, Jefferson, and Columbiana counties, in the state of Ohio,—the state of West Va. and Belmont, Jefferson, and Columbiana counties, Ohio, to be considered as exclusive territory of the party of the second part, but Green, Fayette, and Washington counties, in the state of Pennsylvania, to be considered as open territory: and the party of the first part shall credit the party of the second part with the regular discounts as hereinafter set forth upon all work shipped into the exclusive territory before mentioned during the con-

But in Ludden v. Hazen, 81 Barb. 650, a delivery of liquor to be retailed and to be paid for when sold, the title to remain in wholesale dealer until sold, was held to be fraudulent as against the creditors of the retailer, and subject to his debts. The contract was held merely colorable, with a view to the suit after levy, the court saying: "The retaining of the renewed ownership by the plaintiff was a mere farce, and could have served no honest purpose;" and the retailer was not to sell as agent or on commission, but was to deal with the goods as his own, and such dealing was inconsistent with the ownership of the seller.

This case was followed by Bonesteel v. Flack, 41 Barb. 435. A similar case where the court held the bill of sale, as set out in the invoice, to be absolute and not susceptible of parol proof contradicting its terms.

In the case of Meldrum v. Snow, supra, some stress was laid on the custom of brewers and the fact that a stock had to be supplied in cold weather as it cannot be removed in warm weather without injury. The court further said: "And it being beneficial to the community to introduce the use of beer, public policy would justify us in favoring the custom."

And under an order, "F. B. . . . ship us . . . for which we agree to pay for as stated below . . . F. B. are not responsible for overcharges in freight, injury or losses in transit . . . we agree to pay for all wagons sold for cash as soon as sold; if sold on time we will indorse and forward the notes . . . If any wagons remain unsold twelve months from invoice to pay for the same, and close the consignment," the goods were liable for debts of retail dealer. Fish v. Benedict, 74 N. Y. 613.

And under a contract of delivery of goods the title not to pass until resold, where the original owners agreed with the assignee for creditors of retailer, that the goods on hand should be sold but not to release the claim of any creditor for goods tinuance of this agreement, whether the orders therefor shall come through the party of the second part or otherwise. The party of the first part further agrees that on all safes or other work sold by the party of the first part from the date hereof to the Westinghouse interests of Pittsburgh, Pa., the party of the second part is to be credited with one half the amount received over the discounts hereinafter set forth, less the cost of delivering the safes on upper floors, no charge to be made party of the second part by party of the first on safes delivered to the Westinghouse interests on the ground floors in Pittsburgh only. The party of the first part grants to the party of the second part the following discounts from their regular price list, copy of which is hereto attached and made part hereof, viz.: From the prices mentioned in pages nine, eleven, and thirteen, seventy per cent, and fifteen per cent off, and the same discounts from any other prices named in said price list, except that the burglar-proof part of any combination, fire and burglar-proof safes shall be calculated at ten cents per pound of actual weight, and except, further, that four tumbler iron-case locks for burglar-proof work shall be charged for extra, at twelve dollars each; four tumbler brass-case locks for burglar-proof work shall be charged for extra, at fourteen dollars each; and end-gear burglar-proof locks shall also be charged for extra. The party of the first part further agrees to furnish the party of the second part with a stock of safes on consignment, said safes to in consignee's hands on commission, the claim of the wholesale dealer against the goods was gone, as these goods were not held on commission. Jordan v. Easter, 2 Ill. App. 73.

Consignments.

Generally the title does not pass to consignee when goods are consigned to be sold and if sold to be accounted for at a given price, and the goods are not liable for consignee's debts. Colorado Soap Co. v. Burns, 2 Colo. App. 89; Converseville Co. v. Chambersburg Woolen Co. 14 Hun, 609; Chesterfield Mfg. Co. v. Dehon, 5 Pick. 7. 16 Am. Dec. 337; Walker v. Butterick, 106 Mass. 237.

So where the goods consigned are to be held as the property of the consignor. Blood v. Palmer, 11 Me. 414, 23 Am. Dec. 547.

So where the goods did not reach consignee. Alexander v. Tomlinson, 40 Ark. 216.

So where the consignee was to receive, hold, sell, account for, and pay over the proceeds less his compensation as agent, and cash sales only were contemplated, no title passed, notwithstanding invoices sent denoted terms of a sale. National Bank of Augusta v. Goodyear, 90 Ga. —.

So where consignor was to stock consignee with coal, wood, and bark to be sold at retail, the consignee to be paid 90 cents a ton for doing the business and the consignee to purchase from the consignor such as may be required, and to account monthly, and consignor to fix the price, retail and wholesale not above the lowest market price. Audenried v. Betteley, 8 Allen, 302.

And title did not pass to consignee where he was to sell at a certain price and to have a commission on each machine sold and to guarantee the notes taken and unsold machines to be paid for in notes or stored for consignor at his option. Weir Plow Co. v. Porter, 32 Mo. 23.

The title does not pass in a shipment of bullion made without notice to consignee, the proceeds to be credited when a sale shall be made, to advances previously made by the consignee, and the consignee cannot replevy the same from the sheriff attaching for the debts of the shipper, before delivery. First Nat. Bank of Helena v. McAndrews, 5 Mont. 325, 51 Am. Rep. 51.

The main case is supported by the decisions above.

And the question of title was for the jury where consignor contracted to supply and ship $1,500 worth of goods to be insured for the consignor and if consignment exceeded $1,500 the consignee was to execute notes for the same, and at the end of two years the consignee was to keep all the goods on hand. Reissner v. Oxley, 30 Ind. 580.

So it is a question for the jury whether a shipment is a sale or consignment, where it was made 29 L. R. A.

on the following order: "Office of . . . general merchandise broker. Consignments solicited. And dealer in wagons, grain, hay, mill feed, etc. . . . Please send me following . . . ship as soon as possible, as I need the goods right now. Want fresh goods," etc. Simpson v. Pegram, 108 N. C. 407.

This appears to be an exceptional case, arising on the construction of printed letterheads.

And the provision of W. Va. Code, § 13, chap. 100, that if a person transacting business as a trader with the addition of the words "factor," "agent," etc., and shall fail to disclose his principal, the goods shall be liable for his debts, is not intended to include the case of an agent holding and selling machinery on commission with the business sign W. M., "Mfrs. Agent." Brown Mfg. Co. v. Deering, 35 W. Va. 255.

But where the contract said: "The agents of — are its customers who are engaged in selling its pianos . . . Such customers are not agents in any sense known to the law . . . it is agreed that the pianos specified in this bill are bought and sold upon the conditions herein set forth." Although the contract also said the goods were consigned to be sold for consignors and on their account, and the pianos to remain the exclusive property of the consignors, it was held to be a fraudulent agreement as to creditors of the consignee. Chickering v. Bastress, 130 Ill. 206.

And property held by consignees is liable for their debts where it was sold for cash to them with the privilege of returning the unsold part, although the contract read, "to act as agents and sell for our account such consignments as they might order from time to time." Hadfield v. Berry, 28 Ill. App. 376.

This was construed to mean that the consignees might pay for the unsold goods with the goods on hand, thus making it a sale.

So where consignee was to settle for all goods on hand at the end of the year by giving his note and the goods were furnished at scheduled prices f. o. b., the vendors could make no claim to the goods sold or removed from their warehouse by the bankrupt, or assert any specific claim to the proceeds. Re Linforth, 4 Sawy. 370.

And the title passed when consignee could sell at his own prices not less than trade price, and on sales made he was to pay a certain price, and he made a sale of goods ordering them shipped direct to third party, and bills were made out against consignee, who then failed. The consignor, having obtained possession of the proceeds of sale, was liable to bankrupt's assignee. Mutter v. Wheeler, 2 Low. Dec. 346.

In this note cases of deposit of grain with a miller or warehouseman to be mixed with other grain and cases of delivery of material to be manufactured before sale are omitted.

be paid for to the party of the first part when sold by party of the second part, and all safes, etc., sold direct by party of the second part, to be paid for to party of the first part in thirty days, by New York draft. The party of the first part also agrees to paint the name, 'The Globe Contract Co., Genl. Agts., Wheeling, W. Va.,' beneath their own name, 'The Barnes Safe & Lock Co.,' on all safes and other work shipped under this agreement into the territory of the party of the second part. It is understood that all prices given in price list are f. o. b. cars at Pittsburgh, Pa. In consideration of the foregoing, the party of the second part hereby agrees to assume the agency for the manufactures of the party of the first part in the territory herein named, and agrees to work said territory with diligence during the continuance of this agreement. This agreement may be terminated by either party's giving to the other thirty days' written notice of their intention of so doing, and at the end of thirty days this agreement shall be considered as canceled. In witness whereof, the said parties have hereunto attached their hands and seals, this — day of —, 1890; the terms of this agreement, however, to have effect as if agreement were dated April 21, 1890. Barnes Safe & Lock Co. [Seal]. Thomas Barnes. Witness: John H. Newell. Attest: John M. Sweeney, Secy. Globe Contract Co. W. D. Updegraff, Prest. F. R. Stewart, Genl. Mgr."

This agency was continued until the 8d day of November, 1890, when the Barnes Safe & Lock Company sent the Globe Contract Company the following notice of the cancellation of the agency, to wit:

"Barnes Safe and Lock Company (Successors to Thomas Barnes & Burke & Barnes), Manufacturers of Improved Fire and Burglar Proof Safes, Vault Doors, and Bank Locks. 124, 126, 127, 129, and 181 Third Ave., between Wood and Smithfield Streets. (Dictated.) Pittsburgh, Pa., Nov. 8rd, 1890. The Globe Contract Co., Wheeling, W. Va.—Gentlemen: We hereby notify you in writing that the contract that exists between us under date of April 21st, 1890, is canceled, according to the terms of the said contract. Please send us statement by return mail of the safes that you now have on hand; also, at the same time, send us N. Y. draft for the safes you have already sold from those we have sent you from time to time; also please advise us what you intend doing about the safes you have left. We thought, in making this contract with you, that you would be able to do us some good work. We are sorry that this step has to be taken, but under the circumstances, and in justice to our interests in the territory we laid aside for you, we hereby notify you that the said contract is canceled. Yours, truly, Barnes Safe & Lock Co. Jno. H. Newell."

To which the following reply was sent:

"The Globe Contract Company, Wheeling, W. Va. Electrical and Mechanical Engineering and Contracting Plans and Estimates Furnished on Application. Wheeling, W. Va., Nov. 7, 1890. Barnes Safe & Lock Co., Pittsburgh, Pa.—Gentlemen: Yours of 3d 22 L. R. A.

inst. to hand, and contents noted. We will prepare statement of sales and safes on hand, and in mean time will expect statement from you of work sold in the territory held by us of which we have had no statement as yet, though we have asked for it repeatedly, and, while we have kept an account of such as came to our knowledge, we naturally reason that we have not all of it on our books. Please attend to this at once, and on receipt of same we will submit our statement. As to safes in stock, you are the party to decide as to them, since you wish to discontinue the agency. They will be at your disposal at any time after we have adjusted matters as outlined above. Very respectfully, etc., Globe Contract Co. F. R. Stewart, Genl. Mgr."

Thus matters were allowed to rest between them until the 9th day of July, 1891. The safe in controversy, being one of the safes consigned to the Globe Contract Company under the agreement aforesaid, was levied on and sold by an execution creditor as the property of the Globe Contract Company, and the defendant in error, Bloch Bros. Tobacco Company, became the purchaser thereof. The purchasers then wrote the following letter to the Barnes Safe & Lock Company:

"The Bloch Bros. Tobacco Co., Wheeling, W. Va. Wheeling, W. Va., July 17, 1891. Barnes Safe & Lock Co., Pittsburgh Pa.: We purchased the other day at constable sale, one of your safes that was owned by the Globe Contract Co., which company failed. The safe was never used. It is a burglar chest safe, No 30,255. We purchased the same to put in our vault, and, upon measuring the same, find it is about 8 inches too wide. The object of this letter is to inquire if we could not exchange this safe for another one of such a size that we could get in our vault. An early answer will oblige yours, truly, The Bloch Bros. Tobacco Co."

Thereupon the safe company immediately brought an action of detinue for the safe, or the value thereof, $200,—before Justice George Arkle, who on the 12th day of October, 1891, rendered judgment for the plaintiff. From this judgment the defendant company appealed to the circuit court of Ohio county, and on the 18th day of February, 1892, the circuit court, neither party requiring a jury, heard the evidence, and gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff then applied for and obtained a writ of error, bringing the controversy before this court.

Messrs. White & Allen, for plaintiff in error:

Where a contract is to receive and sell goods it is a contract of bailment and not of sale.

Walker v. Butterick, 105 Mass. 238; Weir v. Porter, 82 Mo. 23; 2 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 42.

A contract obligating one of the parties to push the sale of the other's coal for one year and to pay for all he may order at an agreed price but not requiring him to take any definite amount, is not a contract of purchase and sale, but an agency.

Cannon Coal Co. v. Taggart, 1 Colo. App. 60.

The fact that the Globe Contract Company may have been required by the contract to collect in its own name from persons to whom it sold does not make it a purchaser.

Chesterfield Mfg. Co. v. Dehon, 5 Pick. 7, 16 Am. Dec. 367; Price v. Ralston, 2 Dall. 60, 1 Am. Dec. 260.

The testimony, in so far as it details facts, shows that this company, if engaged in business at all, was simply professing to act as agent for sale of safes, electrical instruments, etc., and was in the business of mechanical and civil engineering, constructing electrical apparatus, etc. This being so it was not a trader within the definition of that term.

Brown Mfg. Co. v. Deering, 85 W. Va. 259.

"The Globe Contract Company" was a West Virginia corporation.

The purposes for which it was chartered and to which it was limited are clearly set forth in its charter as follows: "for the purpose of contracting for and doing engineering work and construction of any and all kinds, and of conducting a general manufacturing business." How could it conduct the business of "a trader?"

Thomas v. West Jersey R. Co. 101 U. S. 71, 25 L. ed. 950.

A lien for commissions is a personal privilege and can only be enforced when the goods are in possession of the agent or factor, and not after possession in him has ceased. It is possession and possession alone, which gives the right and power to enforce such a lien. As soon as possession ends the lien ends.

Marseilles Mfg. Co. v. Morgan, 12 Neb. 68; Robinson v. Larrabee, 63 Me. 116; Bailey v. Quint, 22 Vt. 474; Vinal v. Spofford, 139 Mass. 127.

The factor's right to a lien is a personal privilege and cannot be transferred, nor can the question arise between any one but the principal and the factor.

Mr. W. F. Hubbard, for defendant in error:

1. This safe was sold by the plaintiff to the Globe Contract Company. This safe was furnished under the second part of the agreement, and that contract, whether we look at its language or real nature, constituted a sale and not an agency. Here the Globe Contract Company and not the final customer was to pay the plaintiff for the safe; it could sell at prices fixed by itself, its profits being the difference between that price and the price to it fixed by the contract; it was to pay the freight, for the prices of the plaintiff were f. o. b. cars at Pittsburgh. The Globe Contract Company had thirty days in which to pay, whether the customer paid it in cash or took a year's credit.

Braunn v. Keally, 148 Pa. 519; Chickering v. Bustress, 130 Ill. 206; Blow v. Spear, 43 Mo. 496, 97 Am. Dec. 412; McArthur v. Wilder, 3 Barb. 66; Sterling Organ Co. v. House, 25 W. Va. 90.

In determining whether the transaction between the plaintiff and the Globe Contract Company was a bailment or a sale, the rule applicable is that where the article delivered is to be returned, the transaction is a bailment, and the title remains with the bailor. Where there is no obligation to return the specific article, and another thing of equal value may be returned, the receiver becomes debtor to make the return, the transaction is a sale and the title is changed.

2. Even if the safe could be considered not as sold but as in the hands of the Globe Contract Company as the plaintiff's agents, the latter had a lien for the balance due them, and the plaintiff not having paid that balance cannot recover.

Arthur v. Ingels, 11 L. R. A. 557, 34 W. Va. 642; Minor, Inst. p. 449; 1 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 428.

3. The plaintiff stood by and saw this safe sold to defendant as the property of the Globe Contract Company without making any claim.

4. If this safe was the property of the plaintiff in the hands of the Globe Contract Company, as his agent, it was liable to levy and sale as the property of the Globe Contract Company under chapter 100, section 18, of the Code. The Globe Contract Company was a person (Code, chap. 13, § 17, cl. 9) transacting business as a trader in its own name, and this safe was acquired or used in such business.

Even if the Globe Contract Company had not corporate capacity to buy and sell, the plaintiff would be estopped to say so.

5. If the effort of the plaintiff was to sell this safe, reserving the title until the same is paid for or otherwise, such reservation is void under section 8, chapter 74, of the Code.

Herryford v. Davis, 102 U. S. 235, 26 L. ed. 160.

Dent, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The counsel for the defendant maintains that the judgment of the circuit court should be affirmed, because: (1) The safe had been sold by the plaintiff to the Globe Contract Company. (2) If that were not so, and the safe was in the hands of the Globe Contract Company as plaintiff's agents, the latter had a lien for the general balance due them, and the plaintiff, not having paid that balance, cannot recover. (3) The plaintiff stood by and saw the safe sold as property of the Globe Contract Company without making any claim. (4) The Globe Contract Company, a trader, not having complied with the provisions of section 13, chap. 100, of the Code, this safe, acquired and used in its business, was liable for its debts. (5) If the contract was as claimed by plaintiff, it was an attempt to sell goods, reserving the title, and such reservation is void, under section 3, chap. 74, of the Code.

On an examination of many decisions relating to contracts of this kind, we find them apparently contradictory and hard to reconcile; some holding that goods delivered under similar contracts are mere bailments for the purpose of sale; others, that they are sales with reservation of title, and therefore void, under the usual recording acts, as to creditors. But from all the general rule is deducible that the court must determine, from the wording of the contract itself and the circumstances surrounding it, the true intention of the parties in making it; and if the contract was entered into in the form of an agency contract, for the purpose of evading the statute requiring all reservations of title to be recorded, then it should be held void as to creditors. Such was the determination of the court in the case of Chickering v. Bantress, 130 Ill. 206. But where there is no attempt at evasion, but the contract is one of pure agency, providing for a consignment of goods to be paid for, at a fixed price, out of the proceeds of the goods when sold, this is a bailment for sale, and not a sale with reservation of title, and the title remains in the consignor until the goods are sold to a bona fide purchaser for value. Walker v. Butterick, 105 Mass. 238; Weir Plow Co. v. Porter, 82 Mo. 23; Middleton v. Stone, 111 Pa. 589; Dando v. Foulds, 105 Pa. 74. "Ordinarily, if goods are 'consigned' for sale, it is a bailment, and not a sale to the consignee. The goods do not become his property or liable for his debts," "even though consigned on a del credere commission." And the fact that the goods consigned were invoiced at a stated price does not itself constitute the transaction a sale, unless the terms of the consignment be such as to make the consignee, when the goods are sold, the purchaser and principal debtor for the goods. Benjamin, Sales, 6th ed. p. 7; also, 3 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 840. Applying these principles to this case, we find that the contract entered into was one of pure agency, without any attempt or thought of evading the statutory law relating to the recordation of instruments when sales are made reserving the title, but a consignment of safes was made to the Globe Contract Company, as such agent, and not in any sense a purchaser, to have on hand to sell for the Barnes Safe & Lock Company, whenever a purchaser could be secured on not exceeding thirty days' time. If no sales were made, then there was no purchaser, and the safes could only be returned to the consignor. If a sale was made, the title passed, not through the consignee, but direct from the consignor to the purchaser; and the price passed through the hands of the consignee to the consignor, after deducting all over a given amount to pay commissions and expenses. It is true that the consignee could have become the purchaser of any of the safes, at any time it might wish to do so, by accounting for or paying the fixed price according to the contract to the consignor; and, when the consignor gave notice of cancellation, it gave the opportunity to the consignee to become the purchaser of any unsold safes, but this the consignee refused to do, but notified the consignor that the safes were at its disposal as soon as the accounts between them were properly adjusted. The consignor may have been guilty of some negligence in not taking steps at once after the cancellation of the contract to recover possession of the safes, but not so as to divest it of its title, as it was waiting for the statement from its agent. And there is no sufficient evidence to show that it stood by and saw the safe sold as the property of the Globe Contract Company without making claim. On the contrary, the proof clearly shows that it had no knowledge of the levy or sale until the letter written it by the defendant in this case, informing it of the purchase, and wanting to trade it for a different sized safe.

It is hardly worth while to notice the fourth proposition of defendant's counsel,—that the Globe Contract Company was a "trader," within the provisions of section 13, chap. 100, of the Code,—because the Globe Contract Company did not do business as a trader with the addition of the words "factor," "agent," and "company," or "& Co.," within the meaning and contemplation of the statute, but it was doing business in its corporate name, and, while transacting other business, it undertook to act as an agent for the Barnes Safe & Lock Company, which fact was plainly painted on every safe handled by it as such agents. This, being a bailment, and not a sale with reservation of title, as heretofore determined, does not come under the provisions of section 3, chap. 74, of the Code. To sustain the position taken by the defendant, his counsel quotes the law virtually as set out in syllabus 1, Chickering v. Bantress, 130 Ill. 206: "(1) Contract—Whether a Sale or Mere Bailment. Where the identical thing delivered is to be restored in the same or an altered form, the contract is one of bailment; but when there is no obligation to restore the specific article, and the person receiving it is at liberty to return another thing of equal value, he becomes a debtor to make a return, and the title to the property is changed,—it is a sale." The same law is laid down in Benjamin on Sales, 6th ed. p. 5, in these words: "On the other hand, it is now well settled that if the contract clearly contemplates, either by express provision or by established usage of the business, that the identical thing received will not be returned, but only its equivalent, either in the same form received, or in some manufactured condition, or else paid for in money, at the option of the receiver, the transaction is a sale or exchange. The title passes immediately on delivery, and the risk is on the receiver."

This law, while it holds good as to certain kinds of bailments, has no application whatever to that class of bailments known as "consignments for sale," and was therefore improperly applied in the Illinois case above referred to. To so apply it is to do away with all bailments with power to sell, because there is no obligation in such case to restore the specific article, but only the value thereof in money, after a sale is made by the factor or consignee, or, in case no sale is made, then to restore the specific article; and the law quoted above from the fifth page of Benjamin on Sales would be directly in conflict with the law quoted from the seventh page of the same work, but to give the construction given in this opinion is to render both pages harmonious.

The only other point urged by the defendant's counsel is the one on which the circuit court, from the briefs, appears to have decided this case, and that is that the appellant was not entitled to recover possession of the safe in controversy, because the Globe Contract Company had a lien on it for unsettled commissions. It nowhere appears that such is the true state of affairs. Accounts appear to be unsettled, but which way the balance will fall is not made evident. Neither is the Globe Contract Company claiming any such lien. If it had one, it was personal to itself, and was waived when it permitted the safe to be taken from its custody, and it cannot be asserted by a third party. "None but the factor himself can set up this privilege against the owner. It is a personal privilege, and cannot be transferred, nor can the question upon it arise between any but the principal and the factor." 3 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 339; Holly v. Huggeford, 8 Pick. 73, 19 Am. Dec. 303. The constable in this case levied on the safe by direction of the general manager, and apparently the only secured creditor of the Globe Contract Company, then wholly insolvent. This is no protection to the officer, nor to the purchaser who bought at the sale, because the doctrine caveat emptor applies in such cases with full force, and the inscription on the safe, "The Barnes Safe & Lock Co.," "The Globe Contract Co., Genl. Agts., Wheeling, W. Va.," was sufficient to put any reasonable man on his guard, especially as it was a new safe that has never been used; and it can hardly be doubted that such shrewd business men as compose the defendant were not fully informed as to the true state of the title to the safe, and purchased it as a matter of pure speculation. If not so informed, it was their own fault, as they knew where to find the owners of the safe. But whether they were or not does not alter the law of this case. "Persons dealing with factors concerning goods intrusted to them are charged with notice of the extent and limitations upon their powers; and if they deal with them as if they were acting for themselves, or as if they were dealing with their own property, such persons do so at their peril that such is the fact, or that the factor has special authority from the owner, or that, by the well-established and recognized usage and customs of trade in that line, the factor is authorized to deal with and dispose of the goods in the manner proposed. If the transaction is brought in question by the owner of the goods, the burden of proving the factor's authority is upon the party dealing with him." Kauffman v. Beasley, 54 Tex. 563; Story, Ag. § 235. There is no pretense or claim in this case that the Globe Contract Company, through its general manager, was authorized by the Barnes Safe & Lock Company to turn this safe over to the constable, to be sold and applied on the debts of the Globe Contract Company, and he, in so doing, acted wrongfully towards the true owners of the safe and the purchaser at the sale, but could not thereby deprive the true owners of their title, nor confer any title on the purchaser, because he was exceeding the authority conferred by the agency.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and judgment is rendered for the appellant, the Barnes Safe & Lock Company, for the safe in question, or, in lieu thereof, the sum of $125, the agreed value, with interest thereon until paid, and his costs in this and the circuit court and before the justice of the peace expended.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

W. C. SPEARMAN, Appt.,

v.

City of TEXARKANA.

(.....Ark.....)

A physician who is a member of a board of health may recover reasonable compensation for purely professional services which any other physician might render, rendered by him under direction of the board of health without any express agreement for compensation.

(January 13, 1894.)

A PPEAL by the plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Miller County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover compensation for services rendered by plaintiff in inspecting a certain house alleged to have been infected with a contagious disease. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Scott & Jones, for appellant:

When a civil engineer and two others are appointed by the city as a committee to superintend the construction of waterworks for the city, the members of the committee are not such public officers, as are required to perform their services without compensation, where no compensation had been previously provided for, but they are the agents and employes of the city, who may recover reasonable compensation for their services, after their services have all been performed and accepted by the city.

Ellsworth v. Rossiter, 45 Kan. 237; David v. Portland Water Committee, 14 Or. 98; Bunn v. People, 45 Ill. 397; Butler v. Regents of the University, 32 Wis. 124; United States v. Maurice, 2 Brock. 103; State v. Wilson, 29 Ohio St. 349; Fister v. La Rue, 15 Barb. 323; Weeks v. Texarkana, 50 Ark. 81.

The services rendered were beyond and outside the duties required to be performed. "When a town agent, acting for the town,

NOTE.—On the question of the right of an officer to recover for services under an employment by the official body to which he belongs, see, in connection with the above case, Tippacanoe County Comrs. v. Mitchell (Ind.) 15 L. R. A. 520, and note, 23 L. R. A.

or the town itself, employs an attorney at law to prosecute or defend suits against the town, the latter is liable for the services, and the rule is the same if the "town agent" being an attorney, renders for the town professional services, in suits which the proper authorities of the town direct to be instituted."

Langdon v. Castleton, 80 Vt. 285; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 230, note 3.

Messrs. W. H. Arnold and John N. Cook for appellee.

Mansfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By an ordinance duly passed, the city of Texarkana established a board of health, to be composed of the mayor, the city attorney, three aldermen, and one physician of the city. The board was invested with all the usual and necessary powers to effect the purpose of its organization, which was declared to be the protection of the city against "contagious, malignant, and infectious diseases;" and the ordinance provides that all expenses incurred by the board shall be certified to the city council by the president and secretary for allowance and payment, as other claims against the city. The appellant, a practicing physician of the city, and not one of its officers, was elected as the medical member of the board, and, while serving as such, was directed by the board to make personal examination of a case of diphtheria said to exist in the city, and the alleged existence of which had caused the closing of the public schools. He examined the case in person, and made a report upon it to the board. There was no express agreement for this service, and before rendering it the appellant did not inform the board that he would expect a compensation. Several months after the service was rendered, he brought this action in a justice's court to recover for it the sum of $50. The case was taken by appeal to the circuit court, where a trial by jury resulted in a judgment for the city. The only ground on which a recovery by the plaintiff was resisted is indicated by an instruction given to the jury at the defendant's request, and which was that if they found "that the plaintiff was a member of the board of health

... when he was requested by said board to perform the services charged in the account sued on, and that he was a member of said board when he performed said services," their finding should be against him. This instruction was objected to by the plaintiff, who requested the court to charge that the verdict should be for the plaintiff if the jury found that the board had authority to employ a physician to render for the city a service similar to that charged for, and that the plaintiff performed the services sued for, under the board's employment, and by its direction. The latter request was refused, and these rulings of the court upon the two instructions mentioned are the grounds relied upon to reverse the judgment.

It is of no importance to decide whether the membership of the plaintiff on the board of health made him an officer of the city, or whether he is precluded from recovering for his services on the board by the fact that the ordinance establishing it makes no provision for compensating its members. The service on which his claim is based was not performed as a member of the board, and was not a duty incumbent upon the board, or either of its members. It was independent of, and not incidental to, any such duty; and, if the city council itself had employed him to perform the service, the city would clearly have been liable on the contract. Mechem, Pub. Off. § 868; Evans v. Trenton, 24 N. J. L. 764; McBride v. Grand Rapids, 47 Mich. 286, 49 Mich. 289. But, as a member of the board, he was the agent of the city, to act for it, in conjunction with the other members, in taking such measures, by contract or otherwise, as it was competent and necessary to adopt in accomplishing the objects of the board; and, while he stood in that relation to the city, the law, as a means of securing fidelity to his trust, and to guard against any temptation to serve his own interest to the prejudice of his principals, disabled him from making any binding contract with the board. Mechem, Ag. §§ 713, 455, note 3. Such a contract by an agent, in his own behalf, with reference to the subject-matter of the agency, is not, however, absolutely void, but only voidable. Story, Ag. § 211, note 1.

As stated by the supreme court of Wisconsin, there is "a distinction between contracts which are held to be against public policy merely on account of the personal relations of the contractor to the other parties in interest, and those which are void because the thing contracted for is itself against public policy. In the latter class the parties acquire no rights which can be enforced either in the courts of law or equity. But in the former, the thing contracted for being in itself lawful and beneficial, it would seem unjust to allow the party who may be entitled to avoid it to accept and retain the benefit without any compensation at all." Pickett v. Viola School Dist. No. 1, 25 Wis. 558, 8 Am. Rep. 105.

A similar view is expressed in Gardner v. Butler, 80 N. J. Eq. 702, where it was held that while the directors of a corporation could not make an agreement, enforceable against the company, to pay themselves a stipulated sum for their services, they could recover on the quantum meruit for such services as they had rendered, and the benefit of which the company had received. The court said that, although the agreement was "of no binding force as a contract," the directors had "a right to serve the company in the capacity of officers, agents, or employes, and for such services the law will enable them to recover a just and reasonable compensation." To deny them this, it was said, would be "manifestly inequitable," and "would pervert a rule of law which is intended to guard against fraud and injustice." But their claim was not allowed to have any basis upon the contract they had undertaken to make with themselves, and the court declared that "it must rest exclusively upon its fairness and justice." The doctrine of these cases appears to be that the contract of the agent being, as the Wisconsin court said, "rather voidable, in equity than absolutely void at law," the principal, in avoiding it, must himself do what equity requires. Pickett v. Wiota School Dist. No. 1, 25 Wis. 558. And it was palpably on the same ground that the supreme court of Michigan affirmed a judgment for the actual value of professional services rendered by a lawyer to a city, of which he was mayor, and under an employment by the common council, of which he was a member. Niles v. Muzzey, 83 Mich. 61, 20 Am. Rep. 670. See also Macon v. Huff, 60 Ga. 231.

The principle enforced by the authorities cited applies, we think, to the case which the testimony of the appellant here tends to make. He testified that the service charged for was strictly professional; and, if it was so, and was necessary, then, as it was one the board had authority to employ any other physician to perform, the plaintiff is entitled to recover for it what he reasonably deserves to have. But the right to such recovery cannot result from any contract to be implied from the request or direction of the board to render the service; for, as the plaintiff could have made no express agreement with the board that would have been binding on the city, no binding agreement can arise by implication from anything that passed between him and the other members. His claim must be grounded solely on a contract created by the law in consideration of services shown to have benefited the city, and for which it ought, therefore, in justice, to pay. Bishop, Cont. § 188.

While it cannot be said, on the views indicated, that the instruction refused was a full and accurate statement of the law, there was positive error in giving the instruction requested by the defendant; and for that error the judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

Henry RIPPE, Appt.,

v.

(.....Minn.....)

1. Chapter 30, Laws 1893, entitled "An Act to Provide for the Purchase of a Site and for the Erection of a State Elevator or Warehouse at Duluth for Public Storage of Grain," etc., is not an exercise of the police power of the state to regulate the business of receiving, weighing, and inspecting grain in elevators. It has no relation to the regulation of the business, but provides for the state itself engaging in carrying it on.

2. The police power of the state to regulate a business is to be exercised by the adoption of rules and regulations as to the manner in which it shall be conducted by others, and not by itself engaging in it.

3. The act in question is in violation of section 5, article 9, of the Constitution, providing that "the state shall never contract any debts for works of internal improvements or be a party in carrying on such works."

4. "Works of internal improvement," as used in the Constitution, means not merely the construction or improvement of channels of trade and commerce, but any kind of public works except those used by and for the state in the performance of its governmental functions, such as a state capitol, state university, penitentiaries, reformatories, asylums, quarantine buildings, and the like, for the purposes of education, the prevention of crime, charity, the preservation of public health, furnishing accommodations for the transaction of public business by state officers, and other like recognized functions of state government.

(January 5, 1894.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Ramsey County sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to enjoin the erection of a state elevator. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Wilson & Vanderlip, for appellant:

Almost contemporaneously with the adoption of our constitution the supreme court of Wisconsin, in Clark v. Janesville, 10 Wis. 186, used this language respecting it: "The object was to prevent the state, as a state, from becoming a party to such works. The history of other states had shown that for the state itself to engage in these works involved it in difficulty and embarrassment, and that the works could be better prosecuted by private enterprise. Hence the constitution prohibits the state to become a party to such works, or to loan its credit."

See also State v. Farwell, 8 Pinney, 898; Sloan v. State, 51 Wis. 638.

NOTE.—A constitutional question of the highest importance, considering the tendencies of the present time, is decided in the above case denying all power of the state to own and operate a grain elevator, although the decision is based particularly on a constitutional provision against carrying on works of internal improvements.

For questions somewhat akin to this in respect to the purposes for which public funds may be used, see cases in note to Daggett v. Colgan (Cal.) 14 L. R. A. 474, although these cases mostly relate to municipal action.

As to the power of municipalities to engage in such enterprises as the management of electric light plants or waterworks, see Crawfordsville v. Braden (Ind.) 14 L. R. A. 268, and cases cited in that case and the note thereto.

For state regulation of elevators owned by private persons, see People v. Budd (N. Y.) 5 L. R. A. 559, and note, with the affirmation of this case in Budd v. New York, 148 U. S. 517, 36 L. ed. 247.

In Anderson v. Hill, 54 Mich. 477, the supreme court of Michigan, referring to a like provision in the constitution of that state, says: "The early history of this state need not here be referred to to show why such a clause was inserted in that instrument. Some of the reasons were briefly mentioned in People v. State Treasurer, 23 Mich. 499. Experience has demonstrated the wisdom of the policy adopted by the people when they framed the Constitution of 1850 and placed it beyond the power of the legislature to engage the state in works of internal improvement, except by the expenditure of grants of land or other property. This court has, on several occasions, been called upon to apply this provision of the constitution to legislation enacted in contravention of its terms."

See also Sparrow v. State Land Office Comr. 56 Mich. 567; Leavenworth County Comrs. v. Miller, 7 Kan. 493, 12 Am. Rep. 425.

The test for determining the character of an improvement of this kind is the use for which it is designed. If it is for public use, subject to the control and regulation of the legislature, it would seem to come within the meaning of the words "internal improvements."

Messrs. H. W. Childs and George B. Edgerton, for respondents:

Many attempts have been made in this court and elsewhere, says Chief Justice Waite in Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 814, 25 L. ed. 1079, to define the police power, but never with any success. It is always easier to determine whether a particular case comes within the general scope of the power, than to give an abstract definition of the power itself, which will be in all respects accurate.

Police power is the right of the state functionaries to prescribe regulations for the good order, peace, protection, comfort and convenience of the community, which do not encroach on the like power vested in congress by the Federal Constitution.

New Orleans Gas Light Co. v. Hart, 40 La. Ann. 478.

Every law comes within this description, which concerns the welfare of the whole people of the state, or any individual within it, whether it relates to their rights or their duties; whether it respects them as men or citizens of the state; whether in their public or private relations; whether it relates to the rights of person or of property of the whole people of the state, or of any individual within it.

New York v. Miln, 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 139, 9 L. ed. 662.

It is the inherent and plenary power in the state, which enables it to prohibit all things harmful to the comfort and welfare of society.

It is co-extensive with self protection, equal to every emergency and has been well termed, "the law of overruling necessity."

Among the numerous objects to which that power extends, is unquestionably the public market.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 743; Wartman v. Philadelphia, 38 Pa. 209.

The act of the legislature in question does not provide for an internal improvement within the meaning of section 5, article 9, of the State Constitution.

The terms as there used must be restricted to the establishment of highways as agencies of travel and commerce, like railroads and canals, to the improvement of rivers and waterways, the erection of bridges, and whatever else tends to facilitate commercial intercourse.

The constitutional provision involved in this proceeding is to be construed according to the sense of the terms and the intention of the parties.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 70; Opinion of Justices, 15 L. R. A. 809, 155 Mass. 598.

The terms were almost if not quite unknown in Jefferson's day. While he for a time advocated a policy of improvement of the great avenue of trade between the different sections of the country, he never referred to them as works of internal improvement. The subject first came into public prominence when in 1806 congress authorized "the laying out and making of a road from Cumberland in the state of Maryland, to the state of Ohio."

Lossing, Cycl. of U. S. Hist. 686.

In 1817 an act was passed entitled, "An Act to Set Apart and Pledge Certain Funds for Internal Improvements." The pledge of funds was for constructing roads and canals and improving navigation of watercourses, in order to facilitate, promote, and give security to internal commerce among the several states and to render more easy and less expensive the means and provisions for the common defense.

See also Webster's Great Speeches, 80.

During the first half of the century, the fixed and well-defined meaning of the term "internal improvements" was restricted to the objects above named. Is it not then fair to assume that when the framers of our constitution framed the prohibition against the state's contracting any debts for works of internal improvements, they sought to protect the young state from experiences similar to those so recently had by other states.

See Minnesota Constitutional Debates, 478.

Where internal improvements under state authority are spoken of it is universally understood that works within the state by which the public are to be benefited are intended such as the improvement of highways and of travel and commerce.

As the authority of the state to supervise the inspection and weighing of grain, the regulation of charges by elevator companies and the rates and tariffs of railroad companies, is no longer denied (Budd v. New York, 143 U. S. 517, 36 L. ed. 247), it would seem to follow that the state may properly erect at its own expense suitable buildings in which it may the more effectually regulate the weighing and inspection of grain.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The object of this action, briefly stated, was to restrain the board of railway and warehouse commissioners from building a state elevator at Duluth pursuant to the provision of chapter 30, Laws 1893. The plaintiff assails the constitutionality of this act on several grounds; but the only one we find necessary to consider is that it is in violation of section 5, article 9, of the Constitution of the state, which provides that "the state shall never contract any debts for works of internal improvement or be a party in carrying on such works." On the other hand, the contentions of the defendant are: First. That the works contemplated by the act are merely ancillary to the more effectual exercise by the state of its police power to regulate the weighing and inspection of grain stored in bulk, and to regulate the charges for handling and storing the same in elevators or warehouses. Second. That the elevator and other works provided for in the act are not "works of internal improvement," within the meaning of the constitution; that this term refers only to channels of travel and commerce, such as roads, bridges, railways, canals, rivers, and the like. We shall consider these two propositions in the order named.

The right of the state, in the exercise of its police power, to regulate the business of receiving, weighing, inspecting, and storing grain for others, in elevators or warehouses, as being a business affected with a public interest, is now settled beyond all controversy. This power extends even to fixing the charges for such services. Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 118, 24 L. ed. 77; Budd v. New York, 143 U. S. 517, 36 L. ed. 247.

And where a business is a proper subject of police regulation, doubtless, the legislature may, in the exercise of that power, adopt any measures they see fit, provided only they adopt such as have some relation to, and have some tendency to accomplish, the desired end; and if the measures adopted have such relation or tendency the courts will never assume to determine whether they are wise, or the best that might have been adopted. State v. Donaldson, 41 Minn. 74. How the "grain elevator" business may be and has been regulated is illustrated by the statutes of this state enacted for that purpose, notably chapter 144, Laws 1885, and chapter 28, Laws 1893. The first of these statutes declares all elevators or warehouses at certain terminal points, in which grain is stored in bulk, public warehouses. Requires the proprietor or manager to obtain a license and give a bond; to receive for storage all grain in suitable condition when tendered. Prohibits him from mixing grain of different grades. Requires him to keep grain in separate bins when requested by the owner. Provides what kind and form of receipt he shall give for the grain. Prohibits him from inserting anything in the receipt limiting his liability as imposed by the laws of the state. Requires him to make statements under oath of the condition of his business whenever required by the board of railway and warehouse commissioners; also, to post weekly statements of the amount of each kind and grade of grain in store in his warehouse, and to furnish certain statements to the warehouse register; also, to publish a schedule of rates of charges for storage, etc. Provides minutely what he shall do when any of the grain in store becomes damaged or out of condition; also, that all persons interested, and all authorized inspectors, shall have the right at any time to examine the grain in store; that all scales shall be subject to examination and test. Requires the railroad and warehouse commission to appoint a weighmaster and necessary assistants; also, an inspector of grain (who may appoint deputies), who shall have the supervision and exclusive control of the weighing and inspection of grain, subject to such rules and regulations as the board may adopt. Requires the board to fix the fees for weighing and inspecting; also, to establish the grades of grain, and publish the same; and, generally, to exercise control and supervision over the handling, inspection, weighing, and storage of grain, and to establish all necessary rules and regulations for the same. In contrast with this, we turn to the Act of 1893, now under consideration. Its title is, "An Act to provide for the purchase of a site and for the erection of a state elevator or warehouse at Duluth in this state for public storage of grain, and the regulation thereof, to publish a market report, and to appropriate money for that purpose." It orders the establishment of a warehouse and elevator, of a total capacity of 1,500,000 bushels of grain, to be located on Duluth harbor, on St. Louis bay, where there is navigable water, or where docks can be established for the largest vessels in the carrying trade on Lake Superior, and on such point as shall offer terminal facilities with the various railroads centering at the head of Lake Superior; that "said institution" shall be under the control and management of the board of railway and warehouse commissioners, who are required to locate the same, procure the necessary site, and erect the necessary buildings thereon, with the proper equipments and facilities to carry the act into effect, and build or procure "all necessary spur tracks, terminal yards and other facilities to receive and ship grain." The elevator is to have facilities for "weighing, unloading, cleaning and safe keeping of grain in separate bins; also for placing grain of the same grade together." The act provides for the commissioners procuring plans and specifications for elevator, advertising for bids, and letting the contract for its construction to the lowest and best bidder; and provides for the manner of payment for the site and the construction of the building; and appropriates $200,000 for that purpose out of any moneys in the state treasury belonging to the "grain and warehouse fund," to and with which the grain inspection fund, under the Act of 1885, is transferred and consolidated. The elevator is to be under the management of the board of railway and warehouse commissioners, who are to appoint a suitable person as warehouseman "of said state elevator or warehouse," and such assistants as are necessary, and adopt such rules and regulations for the receiving, handling, storing, and delivering grain as they shall deem proper, with power, in case they think that any person or combination of persons is seeking "to monopolize said elevator," to adopt rules limiting the amount of grain which any one person, combination, or corporation may have in the elevator at any one time. They are also required to fix the charges for storing, inspecting, weighing, and handling grain, including the cost of receiving and delivering, which charges are to be a lien on the grain so received, and, when collected, to be paid into the state treasury to the credit of the grain and warehouse fund. The elevator is to be "cleaned and measured up" once each year, to ascertain whether there is any gain or loss by the system of dockage. In connection with their other duties in managing and operating this elevator, the commissioners are to keep on file, for public inspection, publications showing the market price of grain and farm products in certain specified leading markets of this country and Europe; also, the freight rates to such markets by the different means of transportation; also, to publish a weekly bulletin showing the prices paid in said markets for farm products, and the rates of freight between Duluth and Minneapolis and said markets, said bulletin to be kept on file "in said institution," and in the office of the commissioners in St. Paul, and also to be furnished by mail to all persons who may order the same, at a price to be fixed by the commissioners, not exceeding one dollar per annum. The commissioners are also to send samples of grain, being exported, to the various leading markets of the world, "for inspection and to secure prices as to their market value, that they may know whether the markets of Minnesota are within a reasonable difference in price of the markets of the world. Said commission shall have power to purchase and export a quantity of grain to any of said markets, if they deem such course advisable, in order to ascertain the facts in the case; it being the intention of this act to prevent monopolization and unjust control of the markets of the state for farm products."

It seems to us as plain as words can make it—too plain to admit of argument—that the provisions of this act have no relation or reference whatever to the exercise of the police power to regulate the "grain elevator" business. We cannot discover, and counsel have failed to point out, a single provision of the act that has any relation to, or any tendency to accomplish, any such purpose. Aside from the provisions of sections 3 and 4, for what we may term a bureau of information as to the state of the markets and rates of transportation (which has no relation to the exercise of any police power, and the connection between which and an elevator of a capacity of 1,500,000 bushels, with "all necessary spur tracks, terminal yards and other facilities to receive and ship grain," is not apparent), the evident sole purpose of the act is to provide for the state erecting an elevator, and itself going into the "grain elevator" business. All the provisions of the act as to receiving, handling, storing, and delivering grain clearly have reference only to the management of the business conducted by the state in its own elevator. The keynote to the object of the law is, we apprehend, to be found in the last clause of section 4 above quoted as to the intention of the act; and so far as relates to the right of the state, under the police power, to regulate this business, the position of defendants' counsel really amounts to this: That whenever those who are engaged in any business which is affected with a public interest, and hence the subject of governmental regulation, do not furnish the public proper and reasonable service, the state may, as a means of regulating the business, itself engage in it, and furnish the public better service at reasonable rates, or by means of such state competition, compel others to do so. The very statement of the proposition is sufficient to show to what startling results it necessarily leads. It needs no argument to prove that if, in the exercise of the police power to regulate this business, the state itself has a right to erect and operate one elevator at Duluth, it has the power to erect and operate twenty, if necessary, at the same point, and also to erect and operate elevators at every point in the state where there is grain to be handled and stored. Railways are also, under this same police power, the subjects of state regulation; and if it should be deemed that they were not furnishing the public with proper service, or charging unreasonable rates, it could with equal propriety be claimed that it would be a proper means of exercising the police power of regulating the business for the state itself to construct and operate competing railways. The hack business, the pawnbrokers' business, the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, and numerous other kinds of business that might be named, are also the subjects of state regulation; and, if counsel's contention is correct, we do not see why, as a means of "regulating" these kinds of business, the state itself might not engage in running hacks, pawnbrokers' shops, building and operating distilleries and breweries, or even running saloons. But further illustration cannot be necessary. The police power of the state to regulate a business does not include the power to engage in carrying it on. Police regulation is to be effected by restraints upon a business, and the adoption of rules and regulations as to the manner in which it shall be conducted. While the jurists of continental Europe sometimes include under the term "police power" all governmental institutions which are established with public funds for the promotion of the public good, yet, as understood in American constitutional law, the term means simply the power of the state to impose those restraints upon private rights which are necessary for the general welfare of all, and is but the power to enforce the maxim, "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non ledas." The provisions of this act have no reference to the regulation, in any such sense, of the "grain elevator business," and the right of the state to embark in the construction and operation of these works cannot be predicated on the police power.

2. Irrespective of the police power, we may concede, without deciding, that the legislature has unlimited power to embark, at the expense and in behalf of the state, in any business or other enterprise it sees fit, which is not prohibited by the constitution. It remains, therefore, to consider whether the elevator and other works contemplated by this act are works of internal improvement, within the meaning of the constitution.

As already stated, defendants' contention is that the prohibition of the constitution must be restricted to channels of travel and commerce. There is certainly nothing in the etymology of the words that would thus limit their meaning. "Internal" means merely interior, or within any limit; and "improvement" means progress towards what is better, or melioration. But, of course, etymological definitions of words are not controlling, if a phrase has, by common usage and understanding, received a fixed and definite meaning. And, in support of his contention counsel appeals to what he claims has become the fixed historical meaning of "internal improvements" in the political dialect of this country. The history of the term, as well as of the causes which led to the adoption of provisions in the constitutions of many states prohibiting the state from engaging in works of internal improvements, has been gone into very exhaustively by counsel in their brief. It is unquestionably true that in the earlier history of this country the works of "internal improvement" or "public improvements" (the term seem to have been used interchangeably, as synonymous) in which the government, federal or state, embarked, were channels of travel and commerce, such as the construction of turnpikes and canals, and the improvement of rivers and harbors. There were two reasons for this: First, in the then undeveloped condition of our country, highways for travel and commerce were the great and urgent need of the people; second, in those days the tendency was, much more than now, to limit the functions of government to those things which were necessary to secure the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property. Channels of travel and commerce were of such public importance as to be deemed by many to come within that category; but beyond that it was not supposed that it was proper or competent for the state to embark in any public improvements, except such as strictly pertained to its proper governmental functions. Hence, in the controversy between the two great national parties during the last 30 years of the first half of the present century, the phrase "internal improvements" was generally, if not always, used with reference to the building of turnpikes and canals (and latterly railroads), and the improvement of rivers and harbors, because those were the only works, public and internal in their nature, in which it was proposed that the federal government should embark. The same was true of the state governments. The construction of roads, canals, and the like, were the only works of internal or public improvement, outside those required in the performance of strictly governmental functions, in which they engaged. But, suffering as the people were for want of channels of travel and commerce, which seemed the great desideratum for the development of the country, many of the states, for a time, expended large sums of money, and incurred immense debts, in the construction of roads and canals, some of which were of much value, and others of very little value, the cost and management of which, in many cases, resulted in financial disaster, bankruptcy, and even state repudiation. This was notably true in the great financial crash of 1836-37. Experience demonstrated that such enterprises could not be economically constructed or profitably and prudently administered by the government; and hence many of the states not only made provision for disposing of their works of public improvement, but, in view of their bitter experience, inserted in their constitutional provisions prohibiting the state from ever again engaging in such undertakings. The purpose, clearly, was to remand all such words to private enterprise, and to protect the citizen from being taxed for them. These provisions were incorporated by the people in their constitutions as precautions against injudicious action by their legislatures or even themselves, if, in a time of inflation or popular excitement, they should be tempted to embark in public improvements in cases where they were not content to wait the result of private enterprise. This state had an experience of this kind at an early day, in the adoption of the $5,000,000 loan bill, in the form of a constitutional amendment. The result of that experiment is a matter of familiar history. In the case of the states, as in the case of the federal government, it is no doubt true that what was prominently in mind in using the term "works of internal improvement," or "public improvement," were roads, canals, rivers, and other avenues of commerce, and that it was the evils resulting from the states embarking in that class of improvements which chiefly led to the adoption of these constitutional prohibitions. As already suggested, the reason was that this was the only class of public works in which the states, up to that time, had engaged. No case, we admit, can be found, in which it has been held that a grain elevator is a work of internal improvement; for, so far as we can discover, Minnesota is the pioneer state in attempting to embark in any such enterprise. But it is equally true that no case can be found in which it has been held that works of internal improvement mean only channels or mediums of travel and commerce. Indeed, even if the term was to be given the restricted meaning contended for, it is not apparent why it would not still include the works contemplated by this act; for an elevator on the navigable waters of a great lake, with terminal connections with all the railways centering at that point, and equipped with "all necessary spur tracks, terminal yards and other facilities to receive and ship grain," is merely ancillary to the transportation of the property. In fact, the receipt and storage of the grain into, and its delivery out of, such an elevator, is but a part of its transportation.

But we reject any such narrow definition of the term "works of internal improvement," and we are not without authority for our position. An act of the legislature of Nebraska authorized the issue of bonds by any county to aid in the construction of any railroad or other work of internal improvement. There was some ground, here, to hold, upon the application of the doctrine of ejusdem generis, that the act applied only to works similar in kind to railroads. But in Traver v. Merrick County Comrs., 14 Neb. 827, 45 Am. Rep. 111, it was held that a water gristmill erected for public use, the rates of toll to be regulated by the county commissioners, and being subject to regulation by the legislature, was a work of internal improvement, within the meaning of the act; the court saying that the test for determining the character of an improvement of this kind is the use for which it is designed. If it is for public use, subject to legislative control and regulation, it would seem to come within the meaning of the words "internal improvement." In Blair v. Cumming County, 111 U. S. 863, 28 L. ed. 457, the Supreme Court of the United States, in construing this same act, held that bonds issued to aid a company in improving a water power for the purpose of propelling public gristmills were issued to aid in constructing a "work of internal improvement," and indorsed the decision in Traver v. Merrick County Comrs. as a correct exposition of the statute. A statute of Kansas authorized towns and counties to issue bonds "for the purpose of building bridges or to aid in the construction of railroads, water powers or other works of internal improvement." Laws 1873, chap. 68, § 1. Another statute declared all custom gristmills to be public mills, and regulated their management. In Burlington Twp. v. Beasley, 94 U. S. 810, 24 L. ed. 161, it was held that bonds issued to aid in the construction of a steam custom mill were authorized by the statute,—in other words, that a steam custom mill was a work of internal improvement,—the court saying that the expression is usually applied to railroads and canals, but to confine it to those two subjects would be to give the statute a narrow construction; also, that railroads, turnpikes, buildings, bridges, ferries, reclaiming swamps, and the like, are no doubt improvements, and, if such improvements are within the limits of a town or county, they are internal to such town or county. In this case, as in others, the terms, "works of internal improvement," "public improvements," and "public works," seem to be used as synonymous. In Sparrow v. State Land Office Comr., 56 Mich. 567, the court, speaking through Justice Campbell, commenting on a provision in the constitution of that state the same as in our own, says: "The phrase is as broad as language can make it. It can make no difference for what direct or indirect purpose of public utility an improvement is made, so long as it comes within such a definition. All works of convenience, whether for travel, drainage, or irrigation, are similar in their nature. Any such work that is deemed important enough for the state to construct is within the rule, and, if not built in the permitted way [by devoting thereto the avails of any grant to the state for that specific purpose], is within the prohibition." In Leavenworth County Comrs. v. Miller, 7 Kan. 493, 12 Am. Rep. 425, in commenting on a similar provision in the constitution of that state, the court says: "The state, as a state, is absolutely prohibited from engaging in any works of internal improvement. We will concede that this prohibition does not extend to the building of a statehouse, penitentiary, state university, and such other public improvements as are used exclusively by and for the state as a sovereign corporation; but it does extend to every other species of public improvement." And again, in the same case, in enumerating the kind of improvements which the state is prohibited from making, the court mentions, among others, drains, waterworks, gas works, and the like. These cases clearly indicate the general understanding of the judicial mind as to the meaning of the term "works of internal improvement," as used in statutes and constitutions, and demonstrate that the courts have never supposed that it was to be restricted to channels of travel and commerce, but, on the contrary, have always assumed that it included "any kind of work that is deemed important enough for the state to construct," except, of course, as indicated in Leavenworth County Comrs. v. Miller, supra, those which are used exclusively by and for the state, as a sovereign, in the performance of its governmental functions, such as a state capitol, state university, penitentiaries, reformatories, asylums, quarantine buildings, and the like; for education, the prevention of crime, charity, and the preservation of public health are all recognized functions of state government. The distinction between buildings for such purposes, and an elevator in which to carry on the business of storing grain, is too palpable to require argument, and the attempt to liken the latter to the former is little less than absurd.

The far-reaching consequences of restricting this constitutional inhibition to highways for travel and commerce can readily be foreseen. It would leave the state, through its legislature, at liberty, in every period of inflation or excitement, to embark in any and every other sort of enterprise, outside of its legitimate governmental functions, which might be deemed of public benefit. It would admit, not only of building grain elevators, but also of engaging in schemes of drainage.

irrigation, developing water powers, building public gristmills, public creameries and cheese factories, establishing stock yards and packing houses, and other like enterprises, almost without limit. Certainly, to engage in such enterprises as these at the expense of the taxpayers of the state is quite as much within the mischiefs aimed at by the constitution as to engage in the construction of highways for commerce; and there is even less excuse for it, for public highways for traffic and travel are of more general public importance, and less capable of being furnished by unaided individual enterprise.

The time was when the policy was to confine the functions of government to the limits strictly necessary to secure the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property. The old Jeffersonian maxim was that the country is governed the best that is governed the least. At present, the tendency is all the other way, and towards socialism and paternalism in government. This tendency is, perhaps, to some extent, natural, as well as inevitable, as population becomes more dense, and society older, and more complex in its relations. The wisdom of such a policy is not for the courts. The people are supreme, and, if they wish to adopt such a change in the theory of government, it is their right to do so. But in order to do it they must amend the constitution of the state. The present constitution was not framed on any such lines.

It is always a delicate as well as an ungracious task to declare invalid an act of a co-ordinate branch of the government, and should never be done, except in cases free from reasonable doubt. But the legislature is not the people, any more than are the executive and judiciary. Like them, it is a branch—doubtless the most important one—of the government, and, equally with them, subject to the limitations imposed by the constitution; and, whenever it has clearly transcended those limitations, it is the duty of the judiciary to so declare. The act now under consideration seems to us so clearly in violation of the constitution, that it is our bounden duty to so hold.

Order reversed.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

George W. JENKS, Survivor, etc.,

v.

Frank PAWLOWSKI et al., Appts.

(.....Mich.....)

A vendor of village premises upon condition that no intoxicating liquors shall be sold thereon cannot maintain a suit to enjoin the sale of such liquor in violation of such condition where he has subsequently sold adjoining premises without restriction, and such adjoining premises have been and are used for the sale of liquor, since such restrictions are sustained upon the theory that a person has the right in disposing of his property to prevent such a use by the grantee as may diminish the value of remaining land or impair its eligibility for other uses, and the fact that the omission of a restriction in the subsequent deed was a mistake will not affect the result.

(December 8, 1893.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Huron County in favor of complainants in a suit to enjoin the sale of intoxicating liquors on certain premises in alleged violation of a restrictive covenant in the title deeds. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Mr. William T. Mitchell, with Mr. John F. Murphy, for appellants:

Complainants have not only lost but have waived any right they may have had to insist upon the observance of these conditions.

To insist on enforcing the condition as to one in the same locality with another unrestrained works a hardship and is unjust.

NOTE.—For conditions against sale of intoxicating liquor on premises conveyed, see note to Post v. Well (N. Y.) 5 L. R. A. 422.

The party in whose favor the condition is reserved may be held to waive it by any act of his own which would render insisting upon it unjust.

Smith v. Barrie, 56 Mich. 314, 56 Am Rep. 391.

If it was the intent or plan of complainants to shut off the business in that locality for the benefit or preservation of their other property in that vicinity or to protect their homes from the noxious business they have broken their plan by selling other property without similar conditions and so assenting to the business.

Duncan v. Central Pass. R. Co. 85 Ky. 525.

By the sale of part of the same lot without the restriction and permitting the business on the part so sold, defendants had the right to interpret complainant's act as an abandonment of any right to enforce the condition.

Chippewa Lumber Co. v. Tremper, 4 L. R. A. 373, 75 Mich. 36.

Mr. Elbridge F. Bacon for appellee.

McGrath, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill to enjoin the sale of intoxicating liquors upon premises in the village of Sand Beach, conveyed by complainant and another to Frank Pawlowski's grantor by deed dated October 2, 1888, which contained the following provision: "This conveyance and estate in the said premises hereby created is subject to the express condition that if the party of the second part, their heirs or assigns, shall at any time sell or keep for sale, or knowingly permit any person under them so to sell or keep for sale, any spirituous or intoxicating liquors, whether distilled or fermented, the entire title and estate in and to said premises conveyed and created shall cease, and the title in and to said premises shall thereupon at once revert to and vest in the parties of the first part, their heirs and assigns forever, and it shall then be lawful for the parties of the first part, their heirs or assigns, to re-enter upon said premises, and said party of the second part, their heirs or assigns, and every person claiming under him or them, wholly to remove, expel, or put out." Prior to the date of the deed in question, complainant had conveyed several parcels of land in the village to other parties without restriction. The last of these deeds was dated May 20, 1888. It also appears that on January 24, 1885, complainant conveyed a parcel of land adjoining the premises in question to one Lowry by deed without restriction, and that Lowry, from 1888 and down to the time of the hearing, has kept a liquor saloon upon the premises so conveyed. Defendant Frank Pawlowski operated a meat market on his premises until August, 1891, since which time his son has kept a saloon therein. Until years after the establishment of the Lowry saloon, defendant had observed the conditions of his deed. Restrictions of this class are sustained upon the theory that a party has the right, in disposing of his property, to prevent such a use by the grantee as might diminish the value of remaining land, or impair its eligibility for other uses.

Watrous v. Allen, 57 Mich. 362, 58 Am. Rep. 368; Smith v. Barrie, 56 Mich. 314, 56 Am. Rep. 391.

But is there no mutuality in such agreements? It certainly cannot be said that a grantor has the right afterwards to sell an adjoining lot without restrictions, and thereby diminish the value of his former grantee's property, and impair its eligibility for other uses, converting the locality into a saloon locality, and still be allowed to insist upon the restriction. The damage to defendant's property by the permission and existence of Lowry's saloon is quite as apparent as that to complainant by reason of his ownership of an hotel and his residence in the same block. Chippewa Lumber Co. v. Tremper, 75 Mich. 36, 4 L. R. A. 373. It is no answer to say that the omission of the restriction in the deed to Lowry was a mistake. The consequences are the same to defendants. No proceedings have been taken to correct such mistake.

The decrees below must be reversed, and the bill dismissed.

Hooker, Ch. J., concurred in the result; the other Justices concurred with McGrath, J.

I. PUBLIC, OFFICIAL, AND STATUTORY MATTERS.

The constitutionality of a statute providing for the state ownership of an elevator or warehouse for grain is denied as not coming within the exercise of police power and as violating the constitutional prohibition against carrying on works of internal improvement. (Minn.) 857.

The relations of the different parts of the government to each other which have arisen in several important recent cases are again considered in a Rhode Island case, touching the power of the governor to adjourn the general assembly. (R. I.) 716.

Gerrymander.

An apportionment act in the nature of a gerrymander is held unconstitutional in New Jersey on the ground that a division of counties into election districts is not constitutional. (N. J.) 548.

Interstate commerce.

The question what constitutes interstate commerce is involved in a telegraph case in which a message between two points in the same state, though passing through another state, is held not to constitute such commerce. (N. C.) 570.

The question of original packages is discussed very vigorously in a Pennsylvania case, which holds that to be protected as interstate commerce such a package must be of the form and size usual in such commerce, and not put up with a view to retail trade. (Pa.) 155.

The attempt to discriminate against meat from other states is held unconstitutional, although the ordinances involved did not on their face purport to discriminate against interstate business. (O. C. S. D. Ga.) 775.

The claim made in a Nebraska case that a contract for interstate transportation is not subject to state law prohibiting contracts limiting liability is denied, as is also the claim that state courts have not jurisdiction in such case. (Neb.) 835.

Courts.

The jurisdiction of a court to compel town officers to call a new election for a member of assembly is upheld in a Rhode Island case, against a contention that it is interference with the right of the legislature to judge of the election and qualification of members. (R. I.) 65.

The inherent power of a court to provide facilities for its business is illustrated in a case deciding that a court may order the sheriff to operate an elevator in a court-house, notwithstanding the orders of the county commissioners against its use. (Ind.) 898.

Another recent case on the conflict between courts and county officers respecting court rooms holds that the power of courts to make repairs to court rooms cannot be extended to practical reconstruction of the court-house. (Ind.) 402.

Jurisdiction of the supreme court of Wisconsin under the constitution being appellate only, with certain exceptions, a statute attempting to provide for a review of the evidence and for judgment upon questions of fact regardless of the decision below, is held unconstitutional. (Wis.) 609.

Officers.

The contest of the right to municipal offices presents several interesting questions in a Connecticut case in respect to the action of the mayor and of the aldermen in voting and in appointments to office. (Conn.) 653.

The inherent power of the common council of a city to remove a city counselor for whose removal no provision is made is denied in a Michigan case which suggests the interesting question as to implied powers of municipal councils. (Mich.) 842.

The power of a governor as to the appointment of officers to fill vacancies is discussed at length in a Wyoming case, in which an appointment to fill a vacancy until the legislature meets is held not to expire on the meeting of the legislature so as to create a vacancy. (Wyo.) 751.

The clerk of a district court in Kansas is held not liable for a lack of skill or honest errors of judgment in making a search and certifying to the result, as it is not his duty although he supposed it to be, and received twenty-five cents for his services. (Kan.) 99.

The distinction between judicial and discretionary action of county commissioners is discussed in a case which holds that the allowance of additional salary to judges under Indiana statutes is discretionary and not subject to an appeal. (Ind.) 516.

Elections.

Legislative control over municipal elections is elaborately discussed in a Florida case in which, among other things, the use of official ballots and the qualifications of voters are involved. (Fla.) 124.

The question whether the provisions of the Australian ballot law against distinguishing marks are mandatory or directory is settled in an Indiana case to the effect that they are mandatory. (Ind.) 468.

Jurors.

A dentist is held not to be a practitioner of medicine exempt from jury duty, although he is registered as a dental surgeon according to law and has a diploma from a reputable dental college. (Mo.) 799.

Aliens.

The effect on a woman citizen of her marriage to an alien is considered in a federal case, which holds that she does not become expatriated, where the parties reside in this country. (C. C. E. D. La.) 148.

Highways.

The important question of the extent of municipal authorities to permit the use of streets for private purposes is unusually well presented in an Illinois case, in which an ordinance, attempting to vacate a portion of a street for the sole purpose of allowing its use by a private person, was held void. (Ill.) 893.

Taxes.

The question of exemption from taxation of the capital stock of a manufacturing company is presented in Pennsylvania cases, holding that the power of a corporation to engage in mining for the supply of its own raw material does not defeat its exemption. (Pa.) 228.

And this is held even in case such right of mining is actually exercised, but in that case there is required an apportionment of the capital, allowing the exemption of that part only which is used in manufacturing. (Pa.) 282.

The exemption of the property of charitable institutions is held to be limited under the Montana constitution to property used by them. (Mont.) 684.

Taxation of the stock in trade of a partnership is to be made at the place of business and may properly be made to the firm instead of to the members, under a constitutional provision that goods permanently located may be assessed at the place of location. (Md.) 477.

A striking departure from the ordinary course of tax proceedings initiated by a Mississippi statute is declared unconstitutional. (Miss.) 346.

License tax.

The constitutionality of a tax on the exercise by a lawyer of his profession is again affirmed. (Fla.) 699.

A license fee of $1,000 on emigrant agents in certain counties only, who contract for laborers to work outside the state, is held to be unconstitutional as a police regulation, because of its prohibitory character and as a tax because of its want of uniformity. (N. C.) 472.

Common law.

The validity of an oral contract for lands, in the absence of any statute on the subject, is upheld in an Oklahoma case, which holds that the common law, unmodified by English or American statutes, was the law of Oklahoma on the entry of settlers. (Okla.) 501.

Retrospective laws.

The constitutionality of retrospective laws is denied in the case of a statute allowing parol evidence to identify land which is not sufficiently described in a writing. (N. C.) 379.

Judgments for the sale of lands or interests therein are held in a Kansas case to be unaffected by a subsequent statute extending the time for redemption from such sales, although the sales have not yet been made. (Kan.) 465.

Constitutional rights in property.

The right to the use of a street in front of abutting lots is held, on discussion of the conflicting decisions, to be property, which cannot be taken without compensation. (Md.) 668.

The rights of abutting owners, even when they do not own the fee of a street, are discussed at length in a North Carolina case, which holds that compensation is necessary on damaging their property by narrowing a street or making it unsafe or dangerous, by constructing a steam railroad therein. (N. C.) 627.

The power of the legislature to compel a railroad company to receive mileage tickets of other companies is denied as an unconstitutional taking of property without compensation, where no provision is made for the redemption of such tickets. (Mass.) 112.

The noise and vibration of a pumping station for city waterworks is held to constitute an actionable nuisance as to the owner of adjoining property, whose buildings, though subsequently erected, are made untenable thereby; and general authority to the city to construct necessary structures for the waterworks will not justify the nuisance, even if the legislative act authorized it, without compensation to the injured person. (N. Y.) 241.

The constitutional right to make contracts is expressly declared in an Illinois case to be a property right, and a statute compelling weekly payment of wages by certain corporations is held to infringe the rights of employes, as well as of the corporations. (Ill.) 840.

The power of the legislature to interfere with the use of one's own property is illustrated by a decision upholding a statute prohibiting the sale, offering for sale, or possession during the close season, of fish or of trout artificially propagated on one's own premises. (Mass.) 439.

The right of riparian owners to make wharves is held in an Oregon case to be property which cannot be destroyed by revocation of the license to build such wharves, without process of law and due compensation therefor. (Or.) 786.

Eminent domain.

An attempt to take tide lands for railroad purposes is defeated in a Washington case which holds that tide lands are not included in the term "state lands," under the constitution and statutes of that state. (Wash.) 217.

The constitutionality of a statute authorizing a condemnation of land for a private road, on which the decisions have been in conflict, is denied in a Nebraska case. (Neb.) 496.

Public improvements.

The necessity of benefits to be sustained on an assessment for local improvements is clearly shown in an Oregon case which decides that an assessment without benefits is the taking of property without due process of law which the courts may enjoin. (Or.) 718.

II. CONTRACTUAL AND COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

See also, as to Interstate Commerce, supra, I.

Joint or several.

The question whether a subscription contract is joint or several is decided in case of a somewhat peculiar contract by holding the contract to be several only in part. (Minn.) 80.

Unilateral.

The validity of a unilateral promise to pay for property is presented in a case as to a so-called "wheat ticket," which is held valid although no consideration was expressed thereunder when a good consideration existed. (Minn.) 617.

Consignment.

The title to goods consigned to an agent for sale is discussed in a West Virginia case, which holds that the goods belong to the principal until a bona fide sale is made. (W. Va.) 850.

Sale.

The question of the passing of title by delivery of property to a carrier, which is so frequently raised, is decided in a New Jersey case in favor of the passing of title when delivery is made to a carrier to be forwarded, under instructions of a purchaser. (N. J.) 415.

Warranty.

A liability for breach of warranty, disconnected from any sale of property, is upheld in case of false representations, though made in good faith, as to the safety of a horse for a lady to drive, by which she was induced to drive the horse on trial. (Wis.) 512.

The rule which denies any implied warranty of quality for fitness is applied to the sale by stock breeders of an animal that is bought for breeding purposes. (Wis.) 187.

Bills and notes.

The liability of the maker of negotiable paper which is fraudulently raised is considered in a federal case, holding him not liable for the raised amount. (U. S. C. C. App.) 686.

Checks.

The extinguishment of the liability of the indorser of a check by failure to present it in time is held to extinguish also his liability on an indebtedness for payment of which the check was indorsed. (Tenn.) 785.

Bonds.

The liability on an official bond for moneys prudently deposited in a bank is measured by 22 L. R. A.

Sunday.

The constitutionality of a Sunday law is vigorously attacked in a Maryland case, which unhesitatingly declares the validity of the law, although as the writ of error was quashed the question was not strictly open for decision. (Md.) 731.

So in Michigan prohibiting the business of barbers on Sunday under severer penalties than those imposed on other business, but excepting those who keep Saturday as the Sabbath, is held not to be unconstitutional. (Mich.) 696.

the law of bailment, and is not extended by a promise in the bond to pay over moneys received, unless constitutional or statutory provisions have changed the rule. (Colo.) 449.

Deed.

See also infra, VI.

Restrictions in a deed on the sale of intoxicating liquors are held waived by the grantor's failure to incorporate them in subsequent deeds of neighboring premises. (Mich.) 863.

A deed never delivered, although placed in escrow, is not a sufficient memorandum to satisfy the statute of frauds, if the terms of the contract are not recited. (Ill.) 278.

Leases.

See also infra, VI.

The right of a tenant in respect to rent on the destruction of a building is involved in a Washington case, allowing him to recover back rent paid in advance. (Wash.) 618.

Public policy.

The invalidity of a contract on grounds of public policy is illustrated in a case denying recovery on a mortgage assigned merely to evade taxation. (Kan.) 709.

Restraint of trade.

The doctrine of the invalidity of contracts in restraint of trade is somewhat strongly illustrated in a Massachusetts case, which denies the validity of a stipulation not to engage in manufacturing or selling fire alarm or police telegraph machines for a period of ten years. (Mass.) 678.

Contract of officer.

The question of the right of an officer to compensation for services rendered under a contract with the body of which he is a member is raised in respect to a physician performing services by direction of the board of health of which he is a member, and he was allowed reasonable compensation. (Ark.) 855.

As to libel.

Agreeing to indemnify a publisher against costs and damages on account of anything in the book does not show an intent to publish a libel, which will make the agreement unlawful. (Mass.) 253.

Drunkenness.

A contract by an intoxicated person for the sale of property at an inadequate price to one who knew of his incapacity, is held to be insufficient to relieve the possessor from liability for fraud or conversion. (Ohio) 846.

Base ball player.

The claim of the right to discharge a base ball player under a custom or usage on ten days' notice, if he is deficient in playing, is denied under a special contract of hiring for a particular time; but ordinary skill and efficiency of such players is held to be the measure required. (Md.) 690.

Offensive business.

The establishment of an undertaker, in which dead bodies are prepared for burial and sometimes embalmed and dissected, is held to be a business injurious or offensive to the neighboring inhabitants, within the terms of a restrictive agreement. (N. Y.) 182.

Carriers.

The right of a passenger to a seat is involved in a Mississippi case in which damages are given for a conductor's abuse of a passenger who asks for a seat and is compelled to stand, while a seat might have been furnished him. (Miss.) 259.

The validity of a condition in a free pass against any liability whatsoever for injuries to the bearer is upheld in a Washington case respecting a street railway injury. (Wash.) 794.

A strict construction of a carrier's contract with a passenger in favor of the carrier is made in a New Jersey case, which denies the passenger's right to take an ordinary train from a junction to complete his journey, instead of waiting for the so-called connecting train, to which he is held restricted by a round-trip ticket to a point on a branch road, excluding the right to stop off. (N. J.) 251.

Damage for detention of cars, on which there have been few decisions, is held lawful in a Virginia case. (Va.) 580.

A Pennsylvania case of great importance upholds the right of a carrier to give lower rates to a manufacturing establishment for the transportation of coal than to coal dealers for similar service, on the ground that the conditions are dissimilar, because the manufacturing company uses the coal in making products which in turn furnish a large amount of transportation to the carrier. (Pa.) 268.

Insurance.

The validity of an oral contract for insurance is considered in an Ohio case, in which it is held that such contracts may be valid. (Ohio) 788.

The doctrine that a life insurance policy is a wagering contract, in the absence of any relationship by blood or marriage, or of some contractual relation between the parties by reason of which the death of the person whose life is insured may cause damage to the beneficiary, is applied to a case of insurance on the life of a church member for the benefit of a college owned and controlled by the church. (N. C.) 291.

Insurance taken by a carrier "to cover the liability . . . as carriers and warehousemen" is held not to cover the carrier's liability under a collateral contract with the shipper to procure insurance on the property. (Minn.) 890.

The effect upon the rule that warranties in an application for insurance must be literally true without regard to their materiality, of the fact that the answers were made by the company's agent, who is charged with that duty, after full statement of the facts to him, is discussed in an important federal case, in which the company is held bound by the agent's mistake or misconstruction of the terms of the application. (U. S. C. C. App.) 325.

The effect of an insurance agent's knowledge of the facts and his acceptance of the situation as equivalent to that required is held in a Michigan case to prevent a forfeiture for breach of warranty. (Mich.) 819.

The construction of an accident policy, as to the time within which notice of death must be given, is held to require notice only from the time when the fact of death is known, although the policy fixes the time with reference to the date of death. (N. Y.) 483.

The requirement of "sole and unconditional ownership" of the insured is held not to exist in a vendor in a contract of sale, distinguishing some similar cases in the same state. (Mich.) 527.

The interpretation of an accident insurance policy in respect to persons found dead in shallow water presents several interesting questions as to what constitutes disease and the cause of death. (U. S. C. C. App.) 620.

III. CORPORATIONS AND ASSOCIATIONS.

The presumption that a bank is a corporation instead of a partnership is to be made against one who asserts a partnership liability of a member or stockholder, at least where the proof shows that it was organized with a board of directors and declared dividends, which were paid by a cashier's check. (Pa.) 276.

Removal by a corporation of its property, place of business, and all its agencies from the state, is held ground for dissolution. (N. C.) 677.

The doctrine that a corporation cannot escape liability for negligence in the conduct of a business because the business is ultra vires is strongly illustrated and emphasized in a Massachusetts case. (Mass.) 364.

The power of a corporation after insolvency to make a preference, in this case by mortgage, between its creditors, is discussed very elaborately in a Texas case, which denies the power. (Tex.) 802.

On the other hand preferences given by corporate officers to themselves are upheld by a federal court in Michigan, following the state decisions. (U. S. C. C. App.) 817.

The lawfulness of a change in a church constitution is considered by the supreme court of Pennsylvania in one of the cases arising out of the division of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, which holds the new constitution valid and that the adherents thereto, and not the dissenters therefrom, constitute the church. (Pa.) 161.

IV. DOMESTIC RELATIONS.

The question of estoppel of a married woman by deed is discussed in a Texas case denying the estoppel under a statute authorizing her to convey her separate estate. (Tex.) 778.

cer's contract, supra, II.; as to negligence of village trustees, infra, VI.

VI. TORTS; NEGLIGENCE; INJURIES; NUISANCES.

Arrest.

Although arrest without possession of a warrant therefor is illegal, it is held that the officer is not liable for false imprisonment if the accused is not damaged by the officer's failure to have possession of the warrant. (Tex.) 87.

Trespass of cattle.

The fact that a fence in Texas, where cattle are allowed to run at large, was sufficient when built to exclude all cattle in the neighborhood will not affect the question of its sufficiency as against an exceptionally small class of young cattle, such as calves and yearlings, which are afterwards brought in. (Tex.) 105.

The common-law rule as to the duty to restrain one's domestic animals is discussed at length in an Illinois case, which holds that under the Act of 1874 the common-law rule, though long held inapplicable to the conditions existing in that state, is now established. (Ill.) 55.

Negligence as to building.

The duty of an owner of a building to keep it safe for firemen, who enter it under implied license to extinguish a fire, is denied on the ground that such firemen are mere licensees. (Ind.) 198.

Obstruction to channel under bridge.

Obstructions in a navigable channel between piers of a lawful railroad bridge are held to create no liability on the part of the railroad company, if it had no agency in causing them, since it had no control over the channel. (Fla.) 868.

Libel and slander.

The exemption of a witness from liability for defamatory statements in testimony is sustained, unless it is shown that the words were impertinent and malicious. (Or.) 886.

In Louisiana the English rule of absolute protection of defamatory matter in pleadings is not followed, but the protection depends on the good faith of the allegation. (La.) 649.

Physician's liability.

The treatment of a patient by a physician is to be tested by the general doctrines of his school and not by those of other schools. (Conn.) 843.

Injury to wife.

An action by a husband and wife for personal injuries to her is held in New Jersey to be defeated by his contributory negligence on the ground that he has a power coupled with an interest in the suit. (N. J.) 460.

Carrier's negligence.

The presumption of negligence on the part of a carrier, when a passenger is injured in a collision, is held insufficient to create a liability on the part of the railroad company when the facts proved show that the criminal act of a third party was the cause of the accident. (Pa.) 806.

At railroad crossing.

The question of the duty to stop and listen before attempting to cross a railroad is presented in an unusual way in a Michigan case, in which, against the dissent of a minority of the court, it is held that the failure to stop and listen is not negligence as matter of law, although it is on a dark night, so as to prevent a recovery for injuries done by an engine running backwards, as the traveler might reasonably expect that a train in the night would have a headlight. (Mich.) 83.

The negligence of a street-car driver is held not to defeat the right of a passenger in such car to recover for negligence of a railroad company, where he is injured in a collision at a crossing. (Pa.) 606.

So the joint liability of a railroad company and a street railway company for negligence resulting in a collision producing injury to a street-car passenger is held to exist, with the right to uphold the action against one only, if the other is found not negligent. (N. J.) 261.

The question of an implied license of the public to cross a railroad at a certain place is considered in a case which denies that the use of the crossing by the public without objection constitutes a license as a matter of law. (Mass.) 575.

The duty as to signals of trains at a crossing of railroad and highway, where one passes under the other, is presented in a case which holds that the rules and provisions as to grade crossings do not apply. (Wis.) 680.

Crawling under cars across a highway is held contributory negligence notwithstanding a custom to do so. (Idaho) 725.

Master's liability.

The track owned by a manufacturing company, over which a railroad ran cars to deliver freight, is not a part of the railroad company's ways within the Massachusetts Employers' Liability Act. (Mass.) 233.

A very full discussion of the subject of superintendence, within the meaning of an Employer's Liability Act is found in an Alabama case, in which an engineer, although usually aided by a helper, is held not to be in the exercise of superintendence while operating his engine. (Ala.) 861.

The question of the liability of a master for negligence of servants resulting in injury to a mere volunteer is clearly shown in a case which holds that like a trespasser he is entitled to recover for failure of servants to use reasonable care to avoid injuring him after knowledge of his danger. (Minn.) 668.

The liability of a railroad company for a collision caused by a misplaced switch, which resulted from the malicious act of a discharged employé, is discussed in a Georgia case, in which the company had failed to get back a switch key from such discharged employé. (Ga.) 815.

The improper loading of a flat car resulting in injury to a brakeman is held, in a Michigan case reversing a former decision on rehearing, not to make the company liable, where the car was not defective and a competent inspector had been furnished. (Mich.) 392.

The question of the liability of a railroad company for the wrongful act of a brakeman in putting a person off a train in rapid motion is upheld in a Kentucky case, which clearly distinguishes between an act of wanton injury, which is purely malicious, and one performed for the purpose of expelling an intruder. (Ky.) 72.

Injury on highway.

A child playing in a highway is held lawfully there and entitled to protection against negligence in leaving a dangerous embankment, which falls and injures the child. (W. Va.) 561.

Village trustees are held to act officially and not to be personally liable in ordering by vote that a stone crusher be set up and operated at a ledge of rock purchased by them. (Vt.) 824.

By electric car.

The question of lawful speed for electric street-cars is discussed in a New Jersey case which denies their right to run any faster than is compatible with the safety of persons making lawful and customary use of the street. (N. J.) 874.

By electric wires.

The duty of an electric railroad company to place wires where they will prevent dangerous contact of its uninsulated wires with the insulated wires of a telephone company is declared in a Wisconsin case, and enforced by mandamus. (Wis.) 759.

The liability for injury from an electric shock caused by accidental contact with a telephone wire is the question involved in a case in which negligence in leaving the wire near a sidewalk is held to be the proximate cause, although accidental contact of this wire with other heavily charged wires occasioned the injury. (Or.) 685.

Nuisance.

Nearly, if not quite, the most important decision concerning the sale of intoxicating liquors is that of the supreme court of Indiana, which holds that a saloon may constitute an actionable nuisance as to adjoining property owners, although it is occupied by a person who is duly licensed to sell intoxicating liquors, and although no disorderly conduct at the saloon is alleged. (Ind.) 577.

VII. PROPERTY RIGHTS; LIENS; GIFTS; WILLS.

The general language of a deed with covenants sufficient to pass the estate of the grantor is not limited by a clause which recites that it is intended to convey absolutely all the interest of his wife who is named therein as one of the grantors but who has only an inchoate dower interest therein. (Ind.) 244.

Contingent remainders.

The distinction between contingent and vested remainders is discussed at much length in a North Carolina case which holds that a remainder to a person in case he survives another is contingent and that unless he outlives the former life tenant the rule in Shelley's Case cannot apply to give him an indefeasible fee, although the fee is limited to his heirs. (N. C.) 598.

Record title.

The effect of permitting the record title of land to remain in another is held not to give the creditors of the latter any right to attack a conveyance by him to the owner where they rely in giving credit only on their debtor's representations and possession. (Cal.) 256.

Right of abutting owner.

See also supra, L.

A novel case in Minnesota holds that an abutting owner cannot maintain and operate a private railroad or switch in that part of a street of which he owns the fee, to the damage of the abutting owner on the opposite side, by 23 L. R. A.

polluting the air and depreciating the rental value of his premises. (Minn.) 565.

Easement of light.

Interference with the right to light for the windows of the leased building, although it depends on express covenant or agreement, is held in an Illinois case to constitute an eviction. (Ill.) 544.

An implied right to have unobstructed access of light and air to a well or open space for the use of the upper floors of a building is sustained in a Massachusetts case in favor of a tenant against the landlord, where it was necessary to the enjoyment of the premises. (Mass.) 536.

Gas.

The right of an owner of property to do what he will with his own is illustrated in a novel case in which the owner of a gas well is held to have the right to allow the gas to escape and go to waste, although the owner of adjoining wells complains that gas is thereby drawn from his well. The question of malice is discussed, but it is found that the well was dug with good motives, although the motive in allowing it to go to waste, while the other party was willing to pay the expense of plugging the well, is not discussed. (Pa.) 141.

Surface water.

The common-law rule as to surface water is held applicable in South Carolina, giving a landowner the right to throw it back on his neighbor, when necessary to protect his own property. (S. C.) 246.

Watercourses.

The nature of a watercourse is discussed in a case which denies that riparian rights can exist in a sluiceway which has no water in it except when the tide flows through it. (Conn.) 45.

Accretions.

The claim that accretions will belong to the person with whose land the point of contact is first made cannot be upheld, where they extend along the front of different owners. (Mo.) 591.

Party wall.

The right to tear down a party wall and rebuild it is asserted in respect to a wall, each part of which is owned in severalty by the adjoining owners, providing the party removing it replaces it at his own expense and with the least inconvenience and there is a reimbursement of damages occasioned thereby to the adjoining owner. (Md.) 632.

Trademark.

The words "sarsaparilla and iron" are held not to constitute a valid trademark for a medicinal compound, but a descriptive imitation of the label on which they are used is held to be an infringement. (Cal.) 790.

Tenancy by entirety.

An instance of holding personal property by the entirety is furnished in a Pennsylvania case, where a mortgage was taken in the joint names of husband and wife, on the sale of lands held by such tenancy. (Pa.) 594.

While tenancy by the entirety is recognized, a conveyance to husband and wife in joint tenancy is held to make them joint tenants. (Ind.) 42.

Church pews.

The rights of pew holders in a church are discussed in a Massachusetts case, in which the owner of a pew is held entitled to compensation for its destruction, except in case of necessity. (Mass.) 206.

Liens.

The conflict of lien between chattel mortgages and claims for keeping animals is decided in Alabama in favor of a prior mortgage. (Ala.) 78.

Charities.

The indefiniteness of charitable gifts is a question discussed in respect to a devise to trustees "for some charitable purpose." (Tenn.) 179.

Signature by proxy.

Signature by proxy to a sheriff's deed in the sheriff's presence and at his request, is held as efficacious as if made by the sheriff himself. (Ala.) 297.

Will.

Signature to a will by mark is held valid, under a statute requiring the name of the testator to be written near the mark, where the name was written only at the beginning of the will and the mark is at the end. (Cal.) 370.

A signature to a will is held unaffected by the fact that testator's name was not written in her presence, where words showing that it was written at her request are added in her presence. (S. C.) 802.

The person writing her name may also be a subscribing witness. Id.

The competency of attesting witnesses to a will is declared in a Minnesota case to be tested with reference to the time of execution and not of the probate of the will. (Minn.) 481.

A peculiar case of an alleged devise of land is shown where the will merely gave a chest and its contents, among which was a deed of the land. (Mass.) 153.

VIII. CIVIL REMEDIES; RULES AND PRINCIPLES.

The effect of service on a foreign corporation made in another state to give jurisdiction to render a personal judgment is expressly denied in a South Carolina case, although by the statutes of that state, as well as of others, provision is made for such substituted service against foreign corporations. (S. C.) 49.

The abuse of the process of a court by issuing attachment for account books is rebuked in a Michigan case by compelling the surrender, not only of such books, but of copies taken for the purpose of evidence. (Mich.) 698.

A summons naming the defendant only by his surname and the initial of his given name stating that his full name is unknown must be served on him personally under the Nebraska code, and cannot be left at his residence. (Neb.) 578.

Choice of remedy.

The remedy of a servant wrongfully discharged, who was paid up to the date of discharge, is held to be exhausted by the recovery of one week's wages, although he might have had a much larger recovery by pursuing the proper course. (Md.) 74.

Attachment.

Attachment of property in the hands of a trustee is discussed in a case which holds that the comptroller of currency had the legal title to property of the Freedmen's Savings & Trust Company, which was subject to attachment in his hands. (Fla.) 453.

Partition.

An unusual application of the powers of a court of equity to do justice is presented in a case which requires a partition of land owned entirely by one person, where prior purchases of timber had been made from persons then owning an undivided interest in the land. (Mich.) 641.

Garnishment.

Payment by a garnishee into court in advance of adjudication without deduction of wages due a householder for personal labor which are exempt is held to be at his peril, under the Michigan statutes. (Mich.) 732.

Garnishment of a debt due to a nonresident is involved in a Washington case which upholds the garnishment of a foreign insurance company for a loss payable in another state. (Wash.) 287.

Injunction.

The question of the right to an injunction against false publications, injurious to business, is presented in an Indiana case, in which the injunction is upheld. (Ind.) 332.

The subject of injunctions against trespass to cut timber is discussed at length in a Florida case. (Fla.) 283.

Damages.

With much discussion and against dissent, the supreme court of Florida overrules a prior case and holds that for breach of contract to deliver an unexplained cipher message, only nominal damages, or at least the price paid for transmission and delivery can be recovered. (Fla.) 434.

A canal across a farm is held not to divide it into two parcels for the purpose of computing damages for constructing a railroad across one of them. (Pa.) 443.

Evidence.

The admissibility of evidence of payment of a third person's claim as constituting an admission of liability is discussed at length in a New Hampshire case which holds it to be a preliminary question for the justice presiding whether it was intended as admission or as a purchase of peace. (N. H.) 763.

Burden of proof.

The burden of proof as to testamentary capacity is elaborately discussed in a case which holds that the burden is on the proponents of a will to establish sanity, but that when uncertain on the evidence there is a legal presumption of sanity. (Conn.) 90.

Presumption.

The presumption of negligence arising from injury to a passenger does not exist, where the accident was caused by a fall upon a train of a rock which became detached from a natural hillside several hundred feet from the railroad cut. (Pa.) 351.

Set-off.

The right of an administrator to retain a distributive share and apply it on the distributee's indebtedness to the estate is declared to exist without any statute, and to continue against an administrator of such distributee. (Me.) 177.

The relation of co-sureties is illustrated in a somewhat unusual case, where a legacy from one to the other is held subject to deduction of the amount which the latter ought to contribute for a default of their principal. (Pa.) 444.

Limitation of time.

Limitation of actions in favor of the drawer of a check is held to begin to run, at the latest, after the lapse of a reasonable time from the payment of the check. (Neb.) 110.

A statute limiting the time for appeal is held inapplicable to a decree previously entered. (Fla.) 48.

IX. CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE.

The constitutionality of a statute authorizing the court to determine the degree of crime is upheld, where a plea of guilty of murder is made. (N. H.) 744.

Presumption.

The presumption of innocence is held inapplicable on application for a habeas corpus by one detained under a regular mittimus. (N. C.) 678.

Anti-trust law.

A very important case construing an anti-trust law is decided in Texas to the effect that illegal combinations restricting trade do not include all contracts restricting trade, and that a combination of insurance companies to make uniform rates is not prohibited. (Tex.) 488.

Seduction.

Seduction accomplished on promise of marriage, conditioned on pregnancy resulting, is not within a statute making seduction under promise of marriage a criminal offense. (Or.) 840.

Profanity.

The doctrine that profane swearing is not a common nuisance, unless it is heard by citizens and the utterance is of an offensive and annoying character is applied in a case which holds that an indictment is insufficient, where it charges merely that the profanity was on the public streets "to the evil example and to the common nuisance of the good citizens of the state." (Pa.) 353.

Place of crime.

The offense of shooting at another is held committed in Georgia, where the shot is fired from South Carolina and strikes the water near a boat on the Savannah river within the limits of Georgia. (Ga.) 248.

The place of sale of intoxicating liquors sent by express C. O. D. on a postal card order is held to be the place where it was delivered to the carrier. (W. Va.) 430.

GENERAL INDEX

TO

OPINIONS, NOTES AND BRIEFS.

(Separate Index to Notes precedes this.)

ABSTRACTS.

1. A clerk is not liable for want of skill or honest errors of judgment in making an abstract of title and certifying to the result, although he received 25 cents therefor, where it is not his duty to make such search, but he erroneously supposed that it was, and he was neither a lawyer nor engaged in the business of making such abstracts. Mallory v. Ferguson (Kan.) 99

2. It is not part of the official duty of a clerk of the district court of Kansas to make and certify to searches of the records in his office for judgments, liens, or suits pending affecting the title to real property. Id.

3. It will not be presumed, in the absence of evidence, that a clerk whose duty it was not to make abstracts of title, and who was not a lawyer nor engaged in the business of making abstracts, agreed to make a careful search and correctly certify as to the condition of the title, merely because he signed a certificate to an abstract of the title and received 25 cents therefor. Id.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Abstracts; liability of officers for defects in abstracts of title. 99

ACCOUNTS. See WILLS, 11.

ACCRETIONS. See WATERS, 4, 5, NOTES AND BRIEFS.

ACTION OR SUIT.

1. No formal rescission of the contract is necessary before bringing an action for damages in obtaining property from an intoxicated person at an inadequate price. Baird v. Howard (Ohio) 846

2. An employé wrongfully dismissed from service in breach of the contract of hiring cannot maintain an action for unearned wages as such, although he holds himself in readiness to perform his part of the contract; but his action must be for breach of the contract. Olmstead v. Bach (Md.) 74

3. One dismissed from service in breach of a contract to employ him for one year at a certain sum per week, payable weekly, can maintain but one action for the breach, and will not be permitted to maintain a separate action for each weekly installment as it falls due. Id.

4. Previous employment of a special judge to whom a case is sent on change of venue, as counsel for one of the parties in a similar proceeding, this not being a statutory cause for change of venue, does not make it necessary to grant a second change, where but one change is allowed by statute for any statutory cause. Shoemaker v. South Bend Spark-Arrester Co. (Ind.) 882

5. Other tenants who caused the damages are not necessary parties to an action by tenants against a landlord for interference with the enjoyment of the premises, where the time for enjoyment has passed and the only relief that can be granted is by way of damages. Case v. Minot (Mass.) 536

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Action; remedy for wrongful discharge of employé. 74

ADJOURNMENT. See COURTS, 5; LEGISLATURE.

ADVERSE POSSESSION.

1. A conveyance of a pew, sufficient in every respect to convey real estate except in the want of seals or words calling for seals, is a basis of adverse possession, if the grantees occupied under it, believing their title good. Aylward v. O'Brien (Mass.) 206

2. The possession of real estate by one who enters under an agreement to purchase from the owner, but without paying the consideration price, cannot be adverse until he repudiates the seller's title and asserts his own title to the property. Spratt v. Livingston (Fla.) 458

AGISTMENT. See LIENS.

AIR. See EASEMENTS, 2, 6, NOTES AND BRIEFS.

2. A woman citizen of the United States who never intends to leave the country, and never in fact does leave it, does not become expatriated and an alien by marriage with a subject of Italy who previous to his marriage has settled in the United States without intent to return to Italy, but who has never taken any steps toward naturalization. Id.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Aliens; effect of marriage on wife's status as an alien; the ancient doctrine; under modern statutes. 148

ALTERATION OF INSTRUMENTS.

See BILLS AND NOTES, 1.

ANIMALS. See also FENCES; LIENS.

1. The owners of domestic animals are liable at common law for damages committed by them in trespassing, without regard to the negligence of the owners in permitting them to escape, or to the fact of enclosure, or lack of enclosure, of premises on which they are trespassing. Bulpit v. Matthews (Ill.) 55

2. The common-law rule as to the duty of the owners of domestic animals to keep them from trespassing exists in Illinois, under the Act of 1874, except in districts where a vote taken under the statute has established the contrary rule, although for a long period of time the common-law rule was rejected in that state as inapplicable to its conditions. Id.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Animals; liability of owner for trespass of cattle:—general liability for trespassing stock; from highway; driving cattle on lands of another; lack of division fences; removal of division fence; defects in partition fence; liability for trespass of stock of third party; as between owner and keeper. 55

ANTI-TRUST LAW. See CONSPIRACY, NOTES AND BRIEFS.*APPEAL AND ERROR. See also COUNTIES.

1. Permitting witnesses to give an opinion as to the amount of damage inflicted on abutting property by the construction of a viaduct in a street is not reversible error, where the jury is instructed that the damage will be the difference in the value of the property before such construction and immediately afterwards. Spencer v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (Mo.) 668

2. No writ of error lies to the Court of Appeals of Maryland from a decision of the circuit court on an appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace. Judgeford v. State (Md.) 721

3. The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin under the Constitution being appellate only, except in specified cases, a statute attempting to make it the duty of that court to examine and review the evidence preserved by bill of exceptions, and give judgment according to the right of the case, regardless of the decision by the court below, upon questions of fact as well as of law,—is unconstitutional. Klein v. Valerius (Wis.) 609

4. The provision of Fla. Act of May 11, 1898, chap. 4180, that all appeals in chancery, whether from final decrees or interlocutory orders, must be taken within six months after the entry of the decree or order appealed from, 23 L. R. A.

has no retroactive effect, but applies only to decrees and orders entered after the Act took effect, which was Aug. 1, 1893, or sixty days after the final adjournment of the Legislature. Sammis v. Bennett (Fla.) 48

5. An appeal from a decision in quo warranto will not be dismissed because the appellant pending the appeal has been removed from office for insubordination in taking the appeal. State, Rylands, v. Pinkerman (Conn.) 653

6. A motion to strike out plaintiff's testimony is waived if defendant proceeds to introduce evidence. Manufacturers' Acci. Indemnity Co. v. Dorgan (O. C. App. 6th C.) 620

7. Exceptions taken during the trial to the rulings of the trial court may be settled and saved in accordance with Id. Rev. Stat. § 4426, or they may be settled after the trial, in accordance with § 4480, or in the statement on motion for a new trial, and when so settled and saved will be reviewed by the supreme court on appeal. Rumpel v. Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. (Id.) 725

8. A transcript of judicial proceedings, which is not made a part of the bill of exceptions, cannot be considered on appeal, although an offer of it in evidence is recited. Shoemaker v. South Bend Spark-Arrester Co. (Ind.) 332

9. The findings of the trial court should receive such construction as will uphold, rather than defeat, its judgment thereon. Breeze v. Brooks (Cal.) 254

10. The finding of a referee affirmed by the trial court is conclusive as to whether or not an attempted amendment of the confession of faith of a religious society was so radical as to destroy the identity of the church, unless clear error in the finding is pointed out. Schlichter v. Keiter (Pa.) 161

11. A verdict that facts do not sustain a charge of negligence cannot be disturbed on appeal. Gibson v. Huntington (W. Va.) 561

12. Error in sustaining exceptions to portions of an answer is immaterial, if the averments excluded could not have changed the result. Smith v. McDowell (Ill.) 393

13. Refusal to allow answers by witnesses is not prejudicial error, if no possible answers could have been substantially material. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Kane (Ga.) 815

14. The exclusion of evidence of payment of a third person's claim as an admission of liability is not ground for reversal, where it does not appear that it was against the evidence to hold that it was a mere purchase of peace. Colburn v. Groton (N. H.) 763

15. It is reversible error to instruct the jury in a proceeding to establish a will, that if from the whole evidence "it is left uncertain whether or not the testator was of sound mind, then it is left uncertain whether a person of sound mind, within the meaning of our statute, has made the will, and the will should not be sustained," although preceded by an intimation that the proponent has the burden of establishing the will by only a fair preponderance of evidence, and followed by a statement that to defeat the will because of insane delusions they should be established by "a fair preponderance of evidence." Re Barber's Estate (Conn.) 90

16. To instruct the jury that the burden is on the proponents of a will to establish the testator's sanity, and that they must fail if at the close of the evidence "the scales stand evenly balanced," without instructing as to the legal presumption of sanity, is reversible error. Id.

APPORTIONMENT. See COURTS, 7; ELECTION DISTRICTS, NOTES AND BRIEFS.

ARCHBISHOP. See PEW, 2.

ARREST.

1. A warrant in the hands of a marshal or sheriff will not justify a deputy who does not have possession of it, in making an arrest, where the statutes require the warrant to be exhibited on request to the person arrested. Cabell v. Arnold (Tex.) 87

2. A misrecital of the hour of meeting, in a warrant of arrest of absent members of a board of commissioners, which could mislead no one, will not impair the validity of the warrant. State, Rylands, v. Pinkerman (Conn.) 658

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Arrest; right to make without warrant. 87

ASSAULT. See COURTS, 8.

ASSEMBLY. See ELECTION DISTRICTS.

ASSESSMENT. See INJUNCTION, 15.

ATTACHMENT. See ATTORNEYS, 1; LEVY AND SEIZURE, 8, NOTES AND BRIEFS.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

The attorney-general can properly institute proceedings, under Mass. Stat. 1892, chap. 889, to require a railroad company to issue mileage tickets and receive those of other companies, since it is not a proceeding in equity, but rather a petition for a writ of mandamus in a matter concerning the public. Attorney-General v. Old Colony R. Co. (Mass.) 112

ATTORNEYS.

1. Attorneys who have abused the process of the court by causing a writ of attachment known to them to be utterly void to issue for the purpose of obtaining custody of the books and private papers of the defendant, for the purpose of founding subsequent proceedings upon them and for inquisitorial purposes, will be compelled to surrender such books and any copies containing evidence taken from such books and papers, and to make proof that they have surrendered the whole so that it may not be used by them or any one else. Rosenthal v. Muskegon Circuit Judge (Mich.) 698

2. A tax upon the exercise of the profession of a lawyer is not unconstitutional as impairing the obligation of a contract. Odlén v. Woodruff (Fla.) 699

BAILMENT. See FACTORS, NOTES AND BRIEFS.

BALLOTS. See VOTERS AND ELECTIONS.

BALL PLAYER. See also CUSTOM, 8.

The ordinary skill, knowledge, and efficiency of base-ball players is all that is required of a player under a contract of hiring for a definite time, which is silent as to the degree of skill to be possessed. Baltimore Base Ball & E. Co. v. Pickett (Md.) 690

BANKS. See also BILLS AND NOTES, 1.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Banks; liability on official bond for loss by bank failure. 449

BARBERS. See CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 8, 15.

BILLS AND NOTES. See also CHECKS.

1. A bank which issues to a confidential clerk and employé a draft upon another bank, upon such clerk's representation that he desires it for the purpose of making a remittance, is not liable to a bona fide holder of such draft who takes it after it has been raised by such clerk to a larger amount, for the increased amount, since such clerk does not in raising it act for the bank or in his capacity as clerk. Exchange Nat. Bank v. Bank of Little Rock (C. C. App. 8th C.) 686

2. A drawer of a draft or note complete in itself, but in such form as to be easily altered without attracting attention, is not liable for the amount to which it is afterwards fraudulently raised by a third person without his knowledge or authority, even to an innocent purchaser, since it is not his negligence, but the crime of the forger, that is the proximate cause of the loss. Id.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Bills and notes; liability of maker or drawer on raised negotiable paper. 687

BLASPHEMY.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Blasphemy; blasphemy and profanity as crimes:—(I.) definitions; (II.) indictable at common law; (III.) constitution of the offenses; (IV.) the indictment; (V.) state statutes; (VI.) constitutionality of statutes; (VII.) English decisions. 858-860

BOARDS. See also PARLIAMENTARY LAW, 4.

1. The specification of certain objects in a notice of a meeting of a board of aldermen does not exclude action upon any others which are within the range of its general powers. State, Rylands, v. Pinkerman (Conn.) 658

2. Want of notice to rightful commissioners, of the meeting of a pretended board, is fatal to action by the latter without a quorum of legal members. Id.

BONDS.

1. The loss of money deposited by a clerk of court in a bank of reputed solvency, acting as a prudent man would, will not make him liable on his bond to pay over moneys that come into his hands. Wilson v. People, Pueblo & A. V. R. Co. (Colo.) 449

2. A bond given by an officer does not extend the obligation imposed on him by law, unless by force of constitutional or legislative provisions; but his duty and liability as to moneys coming into his hands are measured by the law of bailment. Id.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Bond; liability on official bond for loss of money by theft or bank failure. 449

BOUNDARY. See also COURTS, 8.

A person in a boat on the Savannah River, within 80 yards of the Georgia side, at a point where the river is at least 175 yards wide, is prima facie in the state of Georgia. Simpson v. State (Ga.) 248

BRIDGE. See also WATERS, NOTES AND BRIEFS.

A railroad company is not liable for obstructions in the channel or open space under a drawbridge over a navigable stream, which the company has constructed properly and under lawful authority, if the obstructions are not caused by any instrumentality or fault of the company. Pensacola & A. R. Co. v. Hyer (Fla.) 868

BUILDINGS. See also EASEMENTS, 4, 5.

1. An ordinance requiring the owner of a dangerous or insecure wall or building to make it safe within twelve hours after notice does not apply to a building which is safe for the purpose of commerce and trade, but falls by reason of the large quantities of water thrown into and upon it in extinguishing a fire, while it is stored with stationery by a tenant, thus putting it to an extraordinary strain. Woodruff v. Bowen (Ind.) 198

2. Keeping a building in a populous city safe for firemen is not a duty of the owner at common law, independent of any statute or ordinance. Id.

1. The wrongful act of a brakeman in kicking a boy off from a train in rapid motion for failure to pay his fare is within the scope of his employment, so as to render the railroad company liable for the act, where the brakeman's duties included the assistance of the conductor in collecting fares and ejecting persons who had no right to ride; but if he kicked the boy merely for the purpose of injuring him, and not with the purpose of ejecting him from the train, the employer is not liable. Smith v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Ky.) 73

2. A railroad company is not liable for an injury to a passenger caused by the grossly criminal act of a stranger in letting off the brakes on loaded cars standing on a switch and closing the switch, which had been left open to derail the cars if they got loose, on account of the cars running down grade and out on the main track causing a collision, where there was no negligence in failing to discover the mischief or prevent its effect. Fredericks v. Northern C. R. Co. (Pa.) 806

See also MASTER AND SERVANT, 8.

3. A railroad passenger holding a first-class ticket may recover damages from the company if his request to the conductor for a seat in a first-class coach is met by an explosion of profane and contemptuous wrath, and he is compelled to stand although passengers in the car are occupying more seats than they are entitled to. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. v. Patterson (Miss.) 259

4. One who accepts a free pass on a street railway, with a printed condition that the company shall not be liable under any circumstances, whether by negligence of agents or otherwise, for injuries, is bound by that condition. Muldoon v. Seattle City R. Co. (Wash.) 794

5. A round-trip ticket "via Burlington branch" from a point on the main line of a railroad to a point on the branch line, with the provision that it is "not good to stop off en route," is subject to a regulation of the company making it good on the main line upon those trains only which connect with trains on the branch, and does not entitle a passenger, on reaching the junction upon his return trip, to take an accommodation on the main line which stops at his destination, but which he is enabled to catch only because it is late and by leaving the branch train while it stands on a Y track and walking to the depot, although he might have ridden on the accommodation train without paying any more for his ticket if he had bought separate tickets for the round trip on each line, and although by taking the accommodation he could avoid waiting a half hour or more for the so-called connecting train. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Parry (N. J. Err. & App.) 251

6. A statute requiring railroad companies to issue mileage tickets and to receive those of other roads in payment of fare, without providing any fund for their redemption, or making them a lien on any tangible property, or putting any limit on the number of them which may be issued, or the time within which they must be used, is unconstitutional as an appropriation of individual property to public use without the owner's consent and without legal provision for a reasonable compensation therefor. Attorney-General v. Old Colony R. Co. (Mass.) 113

7. A passenger's standing on the platform of the trail car in a moving cable train, in accordance with custom, is not negligence as matter of law, in the absence of any rule of the company against it. Muldoon v. Seattle City R. Co. (Wash.) 794

8. A passenger upon a street car approaching a railroad crossing, which has stopped 75 feet away from the crossing and again started, is under no duty to be on the lookout to learn if the railroad track can be safely crossed and if by so doing he can see an approaching locomotive, to jump off,—especially where he is crippled. O'Toole v. Pittsburgh & L. E. R. Co. (Pa.) 606

Of goods.

9. A railroad company in the carriage of goods is subject to the liability of a common carrier, and must answer for all losses not occasioned by the act of God or the public enemy, and cannot, in Nebraska, by special contract, limit or relieve itself from this liability. St. Joseph & G. I. R. Co. v. Palmer (Neb.) 835

10. Giving lower rates for transportation of coal to a manufacturing company than to a coal-dealer is not undue or unreasonable discrimination, in violation of Pa. Const. 1874, art. 17, § 8, or of the Act of 1888, which further specifies that the equality of rates required shall be for "a like service for the same place, upon like conditions, and under similar circumstances," where the manufacturing company consumes the coal in creating products which furnish a large amount of additional transportation to the carrier,—and especially where the carrier was bound to give such company the lower rate by a contract made years before the coal-dealer began business. Hoover v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (Pa.) 268

11. A manufacturing company violates its right to accept lower rates for the transportation of coal than are given to a coal-dealer, if it sells coal, even to its own employés; and the carrier on notice of such sales must charge such company the same rates that are charged to coal-dealers. Id.

12. Notice by a carrier of special rates to other shippers entitled thereto by difference of conditions need not be given to regular shippers in order to protect the carrier from the charge of unreasonable discrimination. Id.

13. A reasonable charge for improper delay in unloading cars is not one for transportation, storage, or delivery of freight within Va. Code 1887, §§ 1202, 1208, which provide that no charge other than that provided by law shall be made. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Adams (Va.) 580

14. A charge to a consignee of $1 per day after three days, for every car remaining unloaded after notice of arrival, is not unreasonable. Id.

COMMERCE.

1. The fact that a contract was for the carriage of goods from one state to another does not relieve a corporation of the state in which the contract was made from the rule of law existing in that state, which prohibits special contracts limiting liability. St. Joseph & G. I. R. Co. v. Palmer (Neb.) 835

2. Telegraph messages between points in the same state do not constitute interstate commerce, because of the fact that they traverse another state on the route. State, Railroad Commission, v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (N. C.) 570

3. The sale of a package of goods entire and unbroken, as imported from another state, will be protected as interstate commerce only when the form and size of the package is that usually adopted in the trade for purpose of transportation, and not when adopted with a view to unlawful intrastate retail trade. Com. Philadelphia County, v. Schollenberger (Pa.) 155

4. Showing that a package of material to be used as food was made, stamped, and branded in another state, is not sufficient to show that it is an original package, trade in which is protected by the Federal Constitution, without showing further that it was in the form usually adopted in the trade for purposes of transportation. Com. Philadelphia County, v. Schollenberger (Pa.) 155

5. An original package, trade in which is protected by the Federal Constitution, is such form and size of package as is used by producers or shippers for the purpose of securing both convenience in handling and security in transportation of merchandise between dealers in the ordinary course of actual commerce. Id.

6. That one having goods for sale is a non-resident manufacturer, and sells his goods within the state through an agent, does not, under the Federal Constitution, relieve him from the operation of the local police laws, if he keeps in the state a store containing a stock of goods for the inspection of customers, from which he makes sales to actual customers. Id.

7. A license tax of $500 per annum, imposed on every person selling in a city any meat which is not from animals of his own raising, unless he rents a stall in a public market, while the rent of such stall is $150 per year and the market regulations are so restricted and burdensome as to preclude the reasonable conduct of a wholesale business there, is unconstitutional in respect to wholesale dealers in meat brought from other states, by reason of the necessarily resulting discrimination against them, although the ordinances on the subject on their face purport to apply to vendors irrespective of the places from which it comes,—especially where neither sales nor inspection of meat are restricted to the market, and the regulations are clearly made for the purpose of revenue, and not merely to prevent the sale of uninspected meat. Georgia Packing Co. v. Macon (C. C. S. D. Ga.) 775

CONSPIRACY.

1. A combination of insurance companies to establish uniform rates of insurance and of agents' commissions is not illegal under the Texas Anti-Trust Law of March 30, 1889, prohibiting trusts for restrictions in trade or the production price, or rates of transportation for commodities or articles of commerce, since a contract of insurance is not "trade," nor is it an "article of commerce" or a "commodity." Queen Ins. Co. v. State (Tex.) 488

2. The words "restrictions in trade," in an anti-trust law making such restrictions a felony punishable with heavy penalties, by fine or imprisonment, cannot be construed to include all contracts which in any sense restrict trade, but are limited to combinations such as those between producers or dealers to limit production or supply of an article and thus acquire a monopoly of it, and then unreasonably to enhance prices, or those of quasi public corporations which might be disabled by the combination from performing duty to the public. Id.

1. Long usage and practical interpretation cannot control in the interpretation of the Constitution unless the language is obscure and doubtful. State, Morris, v. Wrightson (N. J. Sup.) 548

2. The power of the executive and judicial departments in a state government is a grant, not a limitation, while the powers of the legislative department are absolute except as restricted and limited by the Constitution. People, Richardson, v. Henderson (Wyo.) 751

3. The constitutional separation of the departments of government is not violated by a statute authorizing circuit courts to repair their court-rooms. White County Comrs. v. Guin (Ind.) 408

4. The constitutional provision that "the state shall never contract any debts for works of internal improvement or be a party in carrying on such works," prevents a state from owning and operating an elevator or warehouse for the public storage of grain, or any other kind of public works excepting those used by and for the state in the performance of its governmental functions. Rippe v. Becker (Minn.) 857

Vested rights.

5. Judgments rendered before the passage of the Act, directing the sale of lands or interests therein, cannot be affected by a statute extending the time for redemption from such sale, although the sale has not yet taken place. Greenwood v. Butler (Kan.) 465

6. The reopening of the decision of tax officers, by which the valuation of taxable property has been fixed and taxes thereon collected, under a subsequent statute authorizing a state revenue agent to assess and collect additional taxes, where, in his opinion, the tax assessment had been too small,—is an unconstitutional interference with vested rights. Adams v. Tonella (Miss.) 346

7. A receipt which was void for uncertainty as a contract for land cannot be made valid by a subsequent statute allowing parol testimony to identify the land. Lowe v. Harris (N. C.) 379

Equal rights.

8. The equal privileges or immunities of citizens are not violated by prohibiting the business of a barber on Sunday under greater penalties than those imposed upon other business, or because an exception is made as to those who conscientiously observe the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath, nor is such a statute invalid as class legislation. People v. Bellet (Mich.) 696

9. A statute requiring weekly payment of wages "by every manufacturing, mining, quarrying, lumbering, mercantile, street, electric, and elevated railway, steamboat, telegraph, telephone, and municipal corporation, and every incorporated express company and water company,"—makes an unconstitutional discrimination between those corporations and others which are organized for pecuniary profit and employ labor. Braceville Coal Co. v. People (Ill.) 840

Due process of law.

10. The enforcement of an assessment for local improvements upon property not at all benefited thereby is the taking of property without due process of law. Oregon & C. R. Co. v. Portland (Or.) 718

11. The liberty to enter into contracts by which labor may be employed in such way as the laborer may deem most beneficial, and to others to employ such labor, is necessarily included in the constitutional guaranty of the right to property. Braceville Coal Co. v. People (Ill.) 840

12. A restriction of the right of corporations to contract with employes as to payment of wages requiring weekly payments denies the constitutional rights of the employes, and does not affect the corporation merely. Id.

Police power.

13. The police power of the state to regulate a business is to be exercised by the adoption of rules and regulations as to the manner in which it shall be conducted by others, and not by itself engaging in it. Rippe v. Becker (Minn.) 857

14. The purchase by a state of a site for state elevators or warehouses, and the erection of such structures for the public storage of grain, is not within the exercise of the police power of the state to regulate the business of such elevators. Id.

15. Prohibiting the opening of barber shops on Sunday is within the police power of the state. People v. Bellet (Mich.) 696

16. The Legislature may forbid the sale, offering for sale, or possession during the close season, of trout which are not alive, although they were artificially propagated on one's own premises, if such close season is not unreasonable. Com. v. Gilbert (Mass.) 439

17. The occupation of an "emigrant agent" does not belong to that class which is so inherently harmful or dangerous to the public that it may be either directly or indirectly restricted or prohibited, where the occupation consists merely in hiring laborers in the state to be employed beyond the limits of the state. *State v. 3. A deed placed in escrow, but not delivered, cannot be regarded as a sufficient memorandum of a parol agreement for the land to satisfy the Statute of Frauds, where it does not recite the terms of the contract. Kopp v. Reiter (Ill.) 273

4. A contract between a creamery supply firm and those agreeing to subscribe for the erection of a butter factory, by which the former was to erect and complete the factory and the latter to pay the contract price, creates a several liability on the part of each subscriber to the amount of his subscription only; but the interests of the subscribers are joint in so far that all must unite in order to repudiate and renounce the contract. Gibbons v. Bents (Minn.) 80

5. No cause of action on contract can arise before the contract is broken. Tillinghast v. Boston & P. R. Lumber Co. (S. C.) 49

9. An agreement by an author to indemnify his publisher for any costs and damages by reason of the publication is not invalid, on the ground that an unlawful publication is intended, where it does not appear that there was any intention on the part of either to write or publish anything libelous. O. F. Jewett Pub. Co. v. Butler (Mass.) 268

10. It is not illegal at common law for insurance companies to make a combination to establish uniform rates of insurance and of commissions to agents. Queen Ins. Co. v. State (Tex.) 483

11. A stipulation not to engage in manufacturing or selling fire alarm or police telegraph machines and apparatus, and not to enter into competition with the purchaser of the business for the period of ten years, with no restriction as to place stipulated, which is entered into by a manufacturer on the sale of his business and a transfer of his patents used therein, is void on the ground of public policy as a contract in restraint of trade, and cannot be upheld on the ground that it concerns property and business protected by patents, or because the restriction is necessary to enable the purchaser to enjoy what is purchased,—even if that could be regarded as a test,—or because it relates to a single commodity which is not of prime necessity and not a staple of commerce. Garnett v. Fire Alarm & Teleg. Co. v. Crane (Mass.) 678

12. A change of decision as to the validity of a certain kind of mortgage, made after some instruments of the kind were made, whereby they are upheld, does not impair the obligation of a contract between the mortgagor and a creditor who gave him credit, when under the existing decisions such mortgages would be held void. Brown v. Grand Rapids Parlor Furniture Co. (C. C. App. 6th C.) 817

13. Either party to a contract, while it is executory, may by explicit direction stop performance on the other side, thereby becoming liable for the damages to which the other is subjected; and thereafter the other cannot proceed with the performance of the contract and increase the amount of damages. Gibbons v. Bente (Minn.) 80

15. The disgrace attaching to the name of a corporation on account of the conduct of its former president and manager, whose name it bears, is not sufficient ground for breaking a contract to furnish it a book for publication. Id.

3. An amendment to the charter of certain corporations by providing for weekly payments of wages, but not applying to all corporations created under the general law, is in violation of a constitutional provision that the charter of no corporation shall be changed by special law. Bruceville Coal Co. v. People (Ill.) 840

4. An educational corporation engaged in operating a public ferry carrying passengers for hire cannot escape liability for negligence in the management of the ferry, on the ground that the business was ultra vires. Nims v. Mt. Hermon Boys' School (Mass.) 364

5. A corporation must be held to have adopted the acts of its agents in conducting a business ultra vires, where its managing officers, knowing the business has been done and that the income of the business has been received and the expenses of it paid by the treasurer, have adopted the action of the treasurer and elected to keep the money. Id.

6. The "business" of a corporation, within a statutory authority to contract in "its authorized business," cannot be construed to include the making of a preferential deed of trust after the corporation has become insolvent and ceased to carry on its operations without any intention of resuming. Lyons-Thomas Hardware Co. v. Perry Stone Mfg. Co. (Tex.) 803

7. Statutory authority of a corporation to hold, purchase, and sell property as the "purposes" of the corporation shall require, applies only to powers to be used while the corporation is carrying on business, and does not give power to execute a preferential deed of assignment after insolvency and permanent cessation of business. Id.

8. A preferential deed of trust executed by a private trading corporation after its insolvency and ceasing to carry on business, without any intention of resuming, is void as against unsecured creditors of the corporation. Id. But see next case.

9. The fact that directors and stockholders of a corporation vote to give a mortgage preferring themselves as creditors does not render it invalid. Brown v. Grand Rapids Parlor Furniture Co. (C. C. App. 6th C.) 817

13. An attachment and sale of the corporate property in a suit against the comptroller of the currency as commissioner and statutory successor of the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company is lawful, where the corporation would have been subject to attachment. Spratt v. Livingston (Fla.) 458

14. The purpose, as well as the effect, of the amendatory Act of Congress making the comptroller of the currency a commissioner of the Freedman's Savings & Trust Company, was to invest him, as such commissioner, with the property, management, and disposition of the affairs of said company for the purposes of liquidation; and he thereby became the statutory substitute and successor of the corporation itself, and not a mere trustee of the bare legal title of its property. Id.

9. The jurisdiction of a court to compel town officers to call a new election for a member of the General Assembly, as required by statute, is not defeated by the fact that each House is the judge of the elections and qualifications of its members, and that the ordering of a new election may involve the question of the validity of a prior election. *State v. 3. The amount of injury suffered by a shipper on account of lower rates given to another shipper, for which he may recover from the carrier, under Pa. Act 1883, cannot be taken, without proof, to be the difference in the rates charged. Hoover v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (Pa.) 263

4. For breach of a contract to transmit or deliver an unexplained cypher, or otherwise unintelligible message, a telegraph company is liable only for nominal damages, or, at most, for the sum paid it for transmission and delivery. Western U. Telog. Co. v. Wilson (Fla.) 484

7. DEDICATION.

1. A reference in deeds to a map of an addition to a city cannot be taken as constituting a dedication of a street marked on a map of the city which is not shown to have been known to the grantor, where the latter had made maps of the addition without showing such streets. Lewis v. Portland (Or.) 736

2. A street shown on that portion of a map representing the oldest part of the city, leaving lots and blocks blank, is not dedicated by the map, which is intended merely to show a new portion or addition not touched by such street, in which the lots and blocks are marked, —especially where the maker has prior maps of the portion including such street, which do not show any street at that place. Id.

1. The general language of a deed with covenants sufficient to pass the estate of the grantor is not limited by a clause which recites that it is intended to convey absolutely all the interest of his wife, who is named therein as one of the grantors, but who has only an inchoate dower interest therein. Davenport v. Williams (Ind.) 244

2. There is a sufficient delivery of a deed, in the absence of evidence to weaken the force of the facts, if the judge of probate before whom it is acknowledged takes it for the purpose of recording it in his office. Lewis v. Watson (Ala.) 297

2. The right to have the light and air enter the windows of a building from an adjoining lot may exist by express grant, or by virtue of express covenant or agreement. Keating v. Springer (Ill.) 544

3. A landlord will not be liable for obstructing his tenant's windows by building on the adjoining close, in the absence of any covenant or agreement in the lease forbidding him to do so. Id.

4. A provision in a lease, that the lessee shall not build at the rear of the premises nearer than 25 feet, is not violated by building on one side of the premises, extending beyond the rear wall of the old building but not extending in the rear of the leased premises. Id.

5. A lease providing that the lessee "shall not build at the rear of said premises nearer than 25 feet, and no obstruction higher than 6 feet shall be placed in such manner as to obstruct light to said premises," prohibits any obstruction higher than 6 feet in any direction from said premises, which would obstruct light to them. Keating v. Springer (Ill.) 544

ELECTRICAL USES AND APPLICATIONS. See also MANDAMUS, 2.

1. Negligence in leaving a telephone wire where it is touched accidentally by a traveler on a sidewalk is the proximate cause of an injury to him from an electric shock, although this was occasioned by accidental contact of the wire with wires of an electric-light company or a street-railway company,—at least, where it does not appear that these were out of their proper position. Ahern v. Oregon Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (Or.) 685

2. A telephone company which, instead of removing its wire on taking it out of a residence, leaves it hanging upon an electric-light company's pole, is bound to look after it, and is liable for an injury to a traveler who comes in contact with it after it has been removed by employes of the electric-light company and hung upon a telephone pole, where he accidentally touches it while it is charged by contact with an electric-light wire or a street-railway company's wire. Id.

3. It is negligence to allow a wire which from its environment is liable to become charged with electricity, to hang over a street or sidewalk at such a height as to obstruct and endanger ordinary travel. Id.

4. An ordinance requiring guard wires for electric wires "whenever it shall be necessary to cross" other electric wires, applies to crossing wires already erected, since it provides a remedy for an existing evil. State, Wisconsin Teleph. Co. v. Janesville Street R. Co. (Wis.) 759

5. An electric-railroad company using strong currents of electricity on wires which are not insulated, which directly cross telephone wires which are insulated, may be compelled to place guard wires where they will prevent the contact of the telephone and railway wires in case of the breaking of poles or the falling of wires on account of storms or otherwise,—especially where there is an ordinance requiring such guard wires, which the telephone company has complied with. Id.

EMINENT DOMAIN. See also CARRIERS, 6; DAMAGES, 5-7.

1. A statute authorizing the condemnation of land for a private road from lands which are shut out and cut off from a public highway, giving an easement to the owner of such lands, who is required to pay damages, is unconstitutional as authorizing the taking of private property for private use. Walton v. Dickson (Neb.) 496

2. The taking of private property only is authorized by statutes providing for the exercise of the power of eminent domain, unless there is either express or clearly implied authority to extend them to public property. Seattle & M. R. Co. v. State (Wash.) 217

3. Tidelands cannot be condemned for railroad uses, by reason of a statutory provision for the appropriation of "state, school, or county land," under the Washington Constitution and statutes, in the nomenclature of which "state" lands did not include tidelands. Id.

4. The state, as owner of the fee of tidelands over which a street runs, and of lands abutting on both sides of the street, is entitled to damages for the occupation of the street for ordinary railroad purposes. Id.

5. The length of a railroad, or the amount of its business, does not affect its right to retain its right of way as against a railroad which subsequently desires to appropriate a portion of it, although the amount of damages may be thereby affected. Id.

6. The statutory right of one railroad to cross another does not apply to a commingling of tracks for 400 feet or more along a 80-foot right of way, making it impracticable to operate either track or set of tracks when any one of the other tracks is in actual use. Id.

7. A claim of the right to lay four tracks on another railroad's right of way may be denied by the court, where the place is practically a street, and the whole room applicable to railroad purposes is extremely limited, and allowing two tracks will give better facilities than the other road enjoys. Id.

8. The convenience of the railroad to be crossed, and the probability of some other means of accomplishing the same purpose, may be considered in determining the necessity of appropriating any part of the right of way by another company, where the statute requires the judge to be satisfied by competent proof of such necessity. Id.

9. An attempt to agree as to the points and manner of crossing must be made by a railroad which desires to cross another before it can seek the aid of a court, under Wash. Gen. Stat. § 1571. Id.

10. It is not error for a judge who heard a case on the question of the necessity of the condemnation of land, under Wash. Code Prac. § 651, to send the jury trial to another judge. Id.

11. The points and manner of crossing, the place where, and whether under, over, or at grade, are to be decided by the court, on an application by one railroad for the right to cross another, under Wash. Gen. Stat. § 1571. Id.

Abutting owners.

12. The right to the use of the street in front of abutting lots is property within the protection of a constitutional provision against taking property without compensation. Spencer v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (Mo.) 668

13. An abutting owner, whether owning the fee in the highway or not, has certain proprietary rights which cannot be taken away without compensation, even under the authority of the legislature. White v. Northwestern N. O. R. Co. (N. C.) 627

14. The use of a street for a steam railroad is a perversion of the street from its original and proper public purpose. Id.

15. An abutting owner is entitled to damages for the diminution of the value of the property caused by reducing the width of the street, or by excavations rendering it unsafe and dangerous, in constructing a steam railroad thereon. Id.

16. A street dedicated to the public for ordinary purposes cannot be appropriated for the construction of a viaduct which completely destroys its use for street purposes, without liability for damages to abutting owners. Spencer v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (Mo.) 668

That the tenant's right to an injunction against the landlord's interference with his employment of the premises terminates pending suit by the expiration of the term will not prevent equity from retaining the suit to assess damages. Case v. Minot (Mass.) 586

ESTOPPEL.

1. Statutory authority to a married woman to convey her separate property by joining with her husband will not extend to an implied covenant of warranty, so as to make such deed—at least in the absence of an express covenant—operate on an after-acquired interest in the property, when she owned only an undivided portion at the time of the conveyance. Wadkins v. Watson (Tex.) 779

2. Permitting the record title of land to remain in another will not make a subsequent conveyance to the real owner fraudulent as to the creditors of the former, where they gave the debtor credit merely on his own representations of ownership and his possession, and did not rely on the records or any act of the owner. Breeze v. Brooks (Cal.) 256

2. The Supreme Court of Rhode Island holds it a matter of common knowledge that there are many Seventh Day Baptists, so called, living in Hopkinton, who observe Saturday as their Sabbath. State v. South Kingstown (R. I.) 65

3. It is a matter of common knowledge that in 1874, and long prior to that date, there was comparatively little vacant land in Illinois, and to be found, not upon the prairies as a rule, but in the poorer and timber portions of the state. Bulpit v. Matthews (Ill.) 55

4. Judicial notice will be taken by a federal court that the distance between Dubuque, Iowa, and Asheville, North Carolina, is more than 100 miles. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Robison (C. C. App. 8th C.) 825

5. Courts can take judicial notice of the offensive character of an undertaking establishment in a locality used for residences. Rowland v. Miller (N. Y.) 182

6. It is a matter of common knowledge that during the year 1893 a large number of manufactories were shut down because of the stringency in the money market. Braceville Coal Co. v. People (Ill.) 340

7. It is a matter of public history that along the valleys of the Lehigh and Schuylkill rivers there are great numbers of blast furnaces, rolling-mills, rail-mills, founderies, machine shops, and numerous other manufacturing establishments which consume enormous quantities of the coal output of the state, and at the same time an immensely large industry in buying and selling coal for domestic consumption is prosecuted in every village, town, and city in this region. Hoover v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (Pa.) 263

8. Judicial notice is taken of the fact that many corporations are organized and doing business in the state outside of certain classes of corporations enumerated in a statute. Braceville Coal Co. v. People (Ill.) 340

Burden of proof; presumptions.

10. The insurer has the burden of showing breach of warranty in the application. Manufacturers' Acci. Indem. Co. v. Dorgan (C. C. App. 6th C.) 620

11. The holder of a check has the burden of proving that the indorser was not injured by delay in presenting it until after the bank had failed, where the indorser has proved that it was not duly presented for payment; and this is the rule whether the suit is brought on the check or on an indebtedness to pay which the check was transferred and indorsed. Kirkpatrick v. Puryear (Tenn.) 785

12. The burden of proving that a bank was a partnership is on the one who asserts it, especially where the proof shows its organization under the name of the Home Savings Bank, with a president, cashier, and board of directors. Gibbs's Estate (Pa.) 276

13. The burden is on those who seek to dispossess of church property trustees who, with their predecessors, have been in continuous possession of it for more than sixty years, to show affirmatively how and when their title accrued and that it is good and valid. Schlichter v. Keiter (Pa.) 161

14. The presumption, in the absence of evidence, is that the fee of a street remains in the abutting proprietor. White v. Northwestern N. O. R. Co. (N. C.) 627

15. Presumption of the delivery of a deed arises if it is found in the possession of the personal representative of the grantee. Lewis v. Watson (Ala.) 297

16. A passenger injured in a collision of cars on the railroad is entitled to the benefit of a presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier. Fredericks v. Northern C. R. Co. (Pa.) 306

17. No presumption of negligence on the part of a railroad company arises from injury to a passenger by the fall, upon a train, of a rock which became detached from the natural hillside more than 800 feet from the top of the cut through which the railroad ran. Fleming v. Pittsburgh, C. O. & St. L. R. Co. (Pa.) 351

19. Although the burden is on the proponents of a will to establish the sanity of a testator, yet after favorable testimony by the attesting witnesses, to defeat the will the testimony of contestants must so far overcome that of proponents as to neutralize the effect of the legal presumption of sanity. Re Barber's Estate (Conn.) 90

20. The presumption of innocence does not apply on an application for a writ of habeas corpus by one held under a commitment. State v. Jones (N. C.) 678

Documentary.

23. A deed, the effect of which has been adjudicated in a prior suit, is not admissible for the purpose of collaterally attacking the prior decision. Shoemaker v. South Bend Spark-Arrester Co. (Ind.) 333

24. An appeal from a probate decree approving or disapproving an alleged will is not an "action by or against the representatives of a deceased person," within the meaning of Conn. Gen. Stat. § 1094, making memoranda in his books evidence of the facts therein stated in such actions. Re Barber's Estate (Conn.) 90

25. A large number of letters alleged to have called forth letters copies of which in a testator's letter book have been admitted on the question of his mental capacity should not be laid in a mass before the jury unread, for them to examine or not as they should feel inclined; but absence of proof of authenticity, that they were received in due course of mail, or of any offer to produce their authors for examination, is not ground for rejecting them if they were found among testator's papers with his memoranda on them. Re Barber's Estate (Conn.) 90

26. A ruling of the postmaster general ordering a postmaster to deliver to one party mail addressed to another is not admissible on the question of malice in publishing circulars which are injurious to the business of the other party. Shoemaker v. South Bend Spark-Arrester Co. (Ind.) 332

To vary writing.

Opinions.

28. A physician who made an autopsy may state that there was no need of what was called an air or water test with the heart, when the sufficiency of the autopsy is questioned. Manufacturers' Acci. Indemnity Co. v. Dorgan (C. C. App. 6th C.) 620

29. A physician may give an opinion that the condition of the lungs of a person found dead in shallow water was what it would have been if he had fallen and been stunned in the water. Id.

30. A physician cannot be asked whether or not in his judgment, from testimony that he has heard, an autopsy was such as to enable a physician to state the cause of death with any degree of certainty, but the question should recite the scope and character of the autopsy. Id.

31. A hypothetical question to an expert witness testifying to a person's mental condition, about which he has no personal knowledge, is improper if it fails to present facts which it includes, in their just and true relation, and causes them to appear in one that is untrue and unjust. Re Barber's Estate (Conn.) 90

32. After enumerating a great number of facts as the basis for a hypothetical question to an expert, it is improper to incorporate the entire testimony of a witness, without stating it to be considered "in connection with" the other facts and propositions named. Id.

33. The fact that many persons after conversing with a testator and observing his conduct believed him to be insane is not a proper one upon which to base a hypothetical question to an expert as to his capacity to form an opinion regarding testator's sanity,—at least if the conversations and descriptions of conduct are not stated; nor is the fact that persons who observed his conduct advised his wife that it was unsafe for her to remain alone with him. Id.

34. In a hypothetical question to an expert as to his capacity to form an opinion regarding the sanity of a testator attacked because of an insane delusion as to the illegitimacy of his children, which is based on their being disinherited, the true value of the estate and the amount given the children should be stated, and not the inventory value and the counsel's statement that the children's share was "inconsiderable" and amounted to "practical disinheritance." Id.

35. The opinion of a witness on the question whether or not it was possible for a person, if standing, to have fallen in the position in which he was found, is not admissible. 23 L. R. A.

Manufacturers' Acci. Indemnity Co. v. Dorgan (C. C. App. 6th C.) 620

36. The question whether or not a person could have rolled from a certain place where he was sitting to that where he was found in a stream is not one on which an opinion of a witness can be given. Id.

37. A conductor whose knowledge has extended to only two or three instances cannot testify that an engineer was habitually reckless in running at excessive speed. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Kane (Ga.) 815

Admissions and declarations.

38. Whether or not the payment by defendant of the claim of a third person was an admission of liability, so as to be provable in the case, or was a mere purchase of peace which cannot be proved, is a preliminary question of fact for the presiding justice. Colburn v. Groton (N. H.) 768

39. Admissions in plaintiff's declaration may be used by defendant as evidence, without offering the declaration itself in evidence, or otherwise proving its admissions. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Kane (Ga.) 815

40. Evidence of admissions or statements made during the limitation period, by a plaintiff claiming land by adverse possession, that the land belonged to a third person, is admissible in ejectment as tending to show that when they were made plaintiff did not claim ownership. Lewis v. Watson (Ala.) 297

41. Evidence of declarations made by a person when sober, as to the value of his property, is admissible on the question of fraud in obtaining it from him shortly after, at an inadequate price, while he was intoxicated. Boird v. Howard (Ohio) 846

42. The custom of people to crawl under cars blockading a street cannot be proved on the question of negligence in thus passing under them. Rumpel v. Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. (Id.) 725

43. Evidence that travelers were accustomed to warn each other to avoid meeting others at a spot in a highway where an accident occurred is not admissible in an action against the town to recover for injuries caused by the accident. Colburn v. Groton (N. H.) 768

44. Evidence of the blockading of streets by trains at other times than that at which an accident for which suit is brought occurred is inadmissible on the question of negligence. Rumpel v. Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. (Id.) 725

45. Evidence of the common experience of railroads in getting back switch keys from employes is inadmissible on the question of negligence of a railroad company in failing to recover such key from a discharged employe. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Kane (Ga.) 815

46. In ejectment for land which plaintiff claims by adverse possession, evidence is admissible for the purpose of showing that the possession has not been continuous, that within the limitation period defendant recovered it in ejectment against plaintiff and was placed in possession. Lewis v. Watson (Ala.) 297

47. On the issue whether or not a physician making an autopsy cut open the stomach, he may state that he had been told that the deceased had been drinking on the day of his death, as bearing on the scope of his investigations. Manufacturers' Acci. Indemnity Co. v. Dorgan (C. C. App. 6th C.) 620

48. Evidence is inadmissible, in an action for libel in charging the plaintiff with unchastity, of her general reputation for virtue and chastity, where no attack is made upon it. Cooper v. Plipps (Or.) 836

Sufficiency.

49. A variance between an allegation that a person came in contact with a wire in the dark while walking on the sidewalk, and received a shock while attempting to remove it from his pathway, and evidence that he touched it in groping to find packages which he had dropped when he slipped and fell on the sidewalk, is not a failure of proof which is fatal, under Hill's (Or.) Code, § 98. Ahern v. Oregon Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (Or.) 635

50. Proof that a person purchased shares in a bank which was then organized and doing business, and received dividends declared by the directors and paid to him in a cashier's check, does not show any liability as a partner. Gibbs's Estate (Pa.) 276

51. That the unconsciousness of a person during which drowning ensues was caused by a mere temporary affliction may be found by a jury, where there is evidence that he was not suffering from disease, but he was found drowned in shallow water. *Manufacturers' Acci. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS. See COSTS, 1.

1. The fact that a debt due by legatees to testator's estate is joint will not prevent the amount of their debt being retained from their claims to legacies. Webb v. Fuller (Me.) 177

2. The administrator of a deceased legatee of an estate is subject to the same right of retainer or deduction for an indebtedness of such distributee to the estate as existed against the distributee. Id.

FACTORS.

1. An agent's right to a lien for commissions and expenditures on goods consigned to him for sale is personal, and not transferable, and does not give his creditors any right in the property. Barnes Safe & L. Co. v. Block Bros. Tobacco Co. (W. Va.) 850

2. The title to goods consigned to an agent for sale, to be paid for when sold, remains in the principal until a sale to a bona fide purchaser, and prevents a sale of the goods on execution in favor of the agent's creditors. Id.

Arnold* (Tex.) 87

FENCES.

The exceptionally small size of young cattle, such as calves and yearlings, on account of which they are able to pass through or under barbed-wire fence, will not excuse the owner of the fence for its insufficiency, where the statutes allow cattle to run at large, so as to give him a right of action for their trespass, although when the fence was built all cattle in the neighborhood were of a larger kind, against which the fence was sufficient. *Clarendon Land, I. & A. 2. A fund kept by a foreign insurance company in one state for the payment of losses in that and another state is subject to garnishment at the instance of creditors of an insured in the latter state to the amount of the debt of the company for a loss upon a policy issued in the latter state, although no portion of such fund has been specifically appropriated to such loss, under a statute providing that any credit or other personal property in the possession or under the control of any person, or debts owing the defendant, may be attached. Id.

23 L. R. A.

3. A garnishee paying into court the amount due the principal defendant in advance of an adjudication, as allowed by How. (Mich.) Ann. Stat. § 8087, which expressly excepts the sum of $25 due to a householder for personal labor, does so at his peril, unless the principal defendant is estopped by circumstances from asserting his claim for this exemption, since the garnishee may always protect himself by his disclosure, by stating at least that he does not know whether the principal defendant is or is not a householder. Crisp v. Wayne & E. R. Co. (Mich.) 732

GAS.

Allowing gas to escape into the open air and go to waste, because, it is not profitable to utilize it, from a well which has been lawfully drilled, without malice or negligence, in one's own premises, gives no legal ground of complaint to a neighboring owner on the ground that gas is thereby drained from the adjoining lands to the detriment of his wells; and the latter has no right to plug the well and prevent the waste of the gas, even at his own expense. *Hague v. 1. The laying out of a street over tide-lands is authorized only for the extension of existing streets, under Wash. Act March 24, 1890, giving a city the right "to project or extend" streets over such lands. Seattle & M. R. Co. v. State (Wash.) 217

2. The inconvenience of the public, or the sufficiency of the remainder of the street for public uses, is immaterial on the question of abating a purpresture in a street in proceedings by the public. Smith v. McDowell (Ill.) 393

3. An obstruction of a street for the length of 85 feet and the width of 5 feet, by a stone wall enclosing an arway to a basement, is a purpresture which is a public nuisance per se, beyond the power of municipal authorities to license without express authority. Smith v. McDowell (Ill.) 898

4. The right of an abutting owner to use the part of the street of which he owns the fee does not extend to the construction of a private railroad therein, the use of which will pollute the air and depreciate the rental value of the abutting owner on the opposite side of the street. Gustafson v. Hamm (Minn.) 565

5. An abutting owner having an easement independently of his ownership of the fee in the street, to its full width in front of his lot for purposes of access, light, and air, which constitutes property, may maintain a private action to prevent the maintenance and operation of a purely private railroad on any part of the street in front of his lot so as to pollute the air and depreciate the rental value of his premises. Id.

6. A purely private railroad cannot be authorized upon or across public streets by a city council, under the provisions of Minn. Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 34, § 47, and Minn. Sp. Laws 1889, chap. 37, which have reference only to such railroads as perform the duties of public or common carriers. Id.

Horner* (Vt.) 824

10. An ordinance attempting to vacate a street or portion thereof, for the sole purpose of allowing a private person to occupy a portion for an area and stairways in connection with the basement of a building, is ultra vires and void, where the only statutory authority is a general power to lay out, improve, and vacate streets. *Smith v. INDICTMENT.

An indictment charging profane swearing and cursing and taking the name of God in vain on the public streets, to the "evil example and to the common nuisance of the good citizens of the state," does not sufficiently aver the facts and circumstances necessary to make it a common nuisance, where it does not aver that it was heard by citizens, or state facts showing the offensive and annoying character of the utterances. *Com. v. INJUNCTION. See also COURTS, 14.

1. A clear case of the inadequacy of the legal remedy must be shown in order to justify the interference of a court of chancery by injunction. Carney v. Hadley (Fla.) 233

2. While insolvency alone of the defendant may not be sufficient to authorize an injunction, yet it is an important element in many cases in determining whether or not a court of chancery should act in granting injunctions. Id.

8. An injunction may be granted against a threatened trespass, under an unconstitutional statute, to take lands for private purposes. Welton v. Dickson (Neb.) 496

4. In order to justify the granting of an injunction against an alleged trespass or threatened injury to trees standing on land, it must appear that the trees are of such peculiar value and importance to the estate as that the alleged injury to them will so affect the uses and purposes for which the estate was designed as to make the injury to them an irreparable loss to the owner. Carney v. Hadley (Fla.) 238

5. Whenever the complainant's title is disputed in cases of trespass, a court of equity will not interfere by injunction on the ground of a multiplicity of suits, until he has successfully established his title by trial at law. Id.

6. Before a court of chancery will interfere to prevent a multiplicity of suits, there must be several persons controverting the same right, and each standing upon his own pretension of right. Id.

7. The constitutional guaranty of the freedom of the press and of speech will not protect against an injunction one who publishes false and injurious statements against a competitor's business. Shoemaker v. South Bend Spark-Arrester Co. (Ind.) 332

8. An injunction may issue against false and malicious claims of title to a patent, with threats of infringing suits against the customers of a competitor,—at least where the defendant is insolvent. Id.

9. A vendor of village premises upon condition that no intoxicating liquors shall be sold thereon cannot maintain a suit to enjoin the sale of such liquor in violation of such condition, where he has subsequently sold adjoining premises without restriction, and such adjoining premises have been and are used for the sale of liquor, since such restrictions are sustained upon the theory that a person has the right in disposing of his property to prevent such a use by the grantee as may diminish the value of remaining land or impair its eligibility for other uses; and the fact that the omission of a restriction in the subsequent deed was a mistake will not affect the result. Jenks v. Paulowski (Mich.) 863

10. The fact that most of the premises in the locality are no longer kept for residences will not deprive a person who still resides there, and who has done or omitted nothing which would defeat the right, of the right to enforce a restriction in an agreement against business "injurious or offensive to the neighboring inhabitants." Rowland v. Miller (N. Y.) 182

11. An injunction will not lie in all cases to prevent the maintenance of a nuisance causing damage to private property, but the remedy may be by an action for damages. Haggart v. Stehlin (Ind.) 577

12. An injunction to prevent the continuance or creation of a nuisance by obstructing a highway may be granted at the suit of the proper officers. Smith v. McDowell (Ill.) 398

13. An injunction may be granted against the construction of a purely private railroad 22 L. R. A.

upon or across a public street, to the detriment of an abutting owner. Gustafson v. Hamm (Minn.) 565

Against official action.

14. The enforcement of city ordinances which attempt an unconstitutional interference with interstate commerce may be restrained by injunction from a federal court. Georgia Packing Co. v. Macon (C. C. S. D. Ga.) 775

15. The courts may enjoin the collection of an assessment upon abutting owners for the construction of elevated roadways which will not at all benefit the property assessed, as there is no foundation for the exercise of discretion of the assessing officers. Oregon & C. R. Co. v. Portland (Or.) 718

16. The proper mode of review of an order of court directing the sheriff to operate an elevator in the court-house for convenience of access to the court-room is by appeal, and not by injunction against the sheriff. Vigo County Comrs. v. Stout (Ind.) 898

17. A void order of court to make a practical reconstruction of the court-house is subject to collateral attack by way of injunction, although the order purports to be for repairs, and would have been valid if confined to necessary repairs only. White County Comrs. v. Gwin (Ind.) 402

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Injunction; against collection of assessment. 718

Against trespass to cut timber:—conservatism of court as to such relief; lack of remedy at law; adequate remedy at law; multiplicity of suits; question of possession or title; preventing waste pending litigation; statutory provisions; allegation of irreparable injury; interference with contract rights. 233

INSURANCE. See also CONSPIRACY; CONTRACTS, 10; EVIDENCE, 10; GARNISHMENT, 2.

1. A carrier's liability on a collateral contract to procure insurance on the property of shippers is not covered by a policy of insurance "to cover the liability of the insured as carriers and warehousemen." Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. v. Home Ins. Co. (Minn.) 390

2. A valid contract of insurance may be made by parol, when not forbidden by statute, or a provision of the company's charter which has been brought to the knowledge of the other contracting party; and, as in other cases of parol contracts, the assent of the parties to the terms of the agreement may be shown by their acts and the attending circumstances, as well as by the words they have employed. Newark Mach. Co. v. Kenton Ins. Co. (Ohio) 768

8. When nothing is said in the negotiations for insurance about special rates of insurance, or special conditions of the policy, it will be presumed that those which are usual and customary were intended. Id.

4. When the terms of an executed policy have been unconditionally accepted by the insured, and it has thereafter been treated as in force by the parties, its delivery will be regarded as complete, though it remain in the hands of the insurer's agent. Id.

5. An agent authorized to make contracts of fire insurance and issue policies may waive payment in cash of the premiums, and give time for their payment, unless there are restrictions upon his authority of which the insured has notice; and such waiver may be express or implied. Id.

6. Where, under an arrangement with the insured by which his insurance was to be kept up to a specified amount by renewals or new policies, it was the custom of the agent to charge the premiums as policies were issued or renewed, and have periodical settlements with the insured, when the premiums would be paid, a credit for a premium so charged, to the next period of settlement, may be implied. Id.

Insurable interest.

7. A college supported by a church has no insurable interest in the life of a member of that church, which will sustain a policy of insurance on his life in favor of the college, although the college paid the premiums, while the application was made by the person whose life was insured. Trinity College v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (N. C.) 291

8. A life insurance policy constitutes a wagering contract, in the absence of any ties of blood or marriage between the beneficiary and the person whose life is insured, or of some contractual relation between them by reason of which damage may result to the beneficiary from the death of the other party. Id.

9. A vendor in an existing contract of sale has not the "sole and unconditional ownership" of a building which is described as "his dwelling," within the meaning of an insurance policy. Hamilton v. Dwelling-House Ins. Co. (Mich.) 527

Health of insured.

10. The construction of the words "spitting of blood," by a medical examiner in filling out answers to an application for insurance, as it was his duty to do, to mean the spitting of blood from the lungs or bronchial tubes only, is conclusive on the insurance company. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Robison (C. C. App. 8th C.) 825

11. An anæmic murmur of the heart, which indicates no structural defect but comes from mere debility or weakness, is not a "bodily or mental infirmity" within the meaning of the provisions of a policy of life insurance. Manufacturers' Acci. Indemnity Co. v. Dorgan (C. C. App. 6th C.) 620

12. A fainting spell produced by indigestion or lack of proper food, which is a mere temporary disturbance or enfeeblement, is not a "disease and bodily infirmity" within the meaning of an insurance policy. Id.

Warranties.

13. The difference between a warranty and a representation in an application for insurance is that a warranty must be literally true without regard to its materiality to the risk, while a representation must be true only so far as it is material to the risk. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Robison (C. C. App. 8th C.) 825

14. The rule that the breach of a warranty of the truth of an applicant's answer avoids an insurance policy, without reference to his good faith or the materiality of the answer, cannot be applied to avoid a policy for the falsity of an answer resulting from a mistake in judgment or an error or blunder of the company's agent, who was specially charged by the company with the preparation of the application, and who made the answers upon a full and truthful statement of the facts by the applicant. Id.

Estoppel or waiver.

15. An insurance company is estopped to question the truth of answers in an application, notwithstanding the application warrants the answers to be true, where they are made under a requirement of the company, by its own medical examiner, who deduces the answers from facts correctly stated to him by the applicant. Id.

16. Knowledge of an insurance agent that the insured had made a contract for the sale of the property estops the company from denying that he had the "sole and unconditional ownership" required by policy. Hamilton v. Dwelling-House Ins. Co. (Mich.) 527

17. The knowledge of an insurance agent that a warranty by the assured that "a continuous clear space of 150 feet shall hereafter be maintained" between the property insured and any woodworking or manufacturing establishment does not represent the existing state of facts and that there is no intent to change the situation, and that the insured cannot control a clear space for that distance, prevents a forfeiture of the policy for breach of the warranty, where the agent accepts the premium and issues the policy without taking any steps subsequently to rescind it though knowing of the breach of the warranty, and it appears that on account of the situation of the property, the manner of its use, and its proximity to water, he considered that the existing space was equivalent to that required. Michigan Shingle Co. v. State Invest. & Ins. Co. (Mich.) 319

18. A clause in a policy withholding from agents authority "to make, alter, or discharge this or any other contract in relation to the matter of this insurance," has no reference to the application which precedes the policy. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Robison (C. C. App. 8th C.) 825

19. Receiving and retaining notice of death without objection and call for further information, besides furnishing blanks for proofs of loss, waives the objection that the notice was not served in time. Trippe v. Provident Fund Soc. (N. Y.) 432
Time for notice.

20. The "ten days from the date of either injury or death," within which notice of the death of a person insured by an accident policy must be given, does not begin to run from the date of his death, occasioned by the fall of a building which he occupied, if the fact of his death is not known until the discovery of his body, but begins to run when the fact of death is known,—especially where the notice of death is required to contain full particulars of the accident and injury. Id.

Cause of death.

21. Drowning is the moving, sole, and proximate cause of death resulting from falling into water, within the meaning of an insurance policy, although the fall may have been due to disease. Manufacturers Acci. Indemnity Co. v. Dorgan (C. C. App. 6th C.) 620

22. Accidental death by drowning is caused indirectly by disease within the meaning of an exception to an insurance policy against death caused directly or indirectly by disease, if drowning ensues upon a fall into the water which is caused by disease. Id.

23. The words "voluntary exposure," "unnecessary danger," and "hazardous adventure," within the meaning of an insurance policy, do not include such exposure as is incident to the ordinary habits and customs of life, but refer to something beyond the ordinary,—such as wanton or gross carelessness. Id.

2. A note or other instrument containing an express promise to pay money, without any time specified, is in law payable immediately, so that interest runs from its date, while a promise to pay upon demand requires at least a judicial demand to set interest running. Horn v. Hansen (Minn.) 617

2. A saloon constitutes an actionable nuisance to neighboring property owners whose property is largely depreciated in selling and rental value by reason of the proximity of the saloon, frequented by persons for the purpose of drinking intoxicating liquors therein, when it is established in a residence neighborhood that has been previously free from such business and which, aside from residences, includes little except churches, schools, a female college, and an orphan asylum, and in which the people are largely opposed to saloons. Haggar v. Stehlin (Ind.) 577

3. The lessor of a building for use as a saloon, which will constitute an actionable nuisance to neighboring property owners, is liable to them for the damage resulting from such use. Id.

4. A saloon-keeper's license for the sale of intoxicating liquors is no defense against liability to adjoining property owners as to whom his saloon may constitute an actionable nuisance. Id.

5. A statute providing for the licensing of liquor-sellers is not unconstitutional on the ground that it is to promote their business, or that it confers a privilege to do an unlawful act, since in the absence of any statute on the subject the business would be open to all. Id.

1. A resolution purporting to be passed by the house of representatives after the general assembly had been prorogued by the governor is of no effect. Re Legislative Adjournment (R. I.) 716

2. The provision in R. I. Const. art. 4, § 9, that neither house, without consent of the other, shall adjourn for more than two days, is subject to implied exceptions, such as that where one house has unlawfully unseated members, thereby depriving towns of their constitutional representation. In such case the other house may adjourn until the vacancies can be filled. Id.

3. The fact that the two houses have not yet joined in grand committee for counting and declaring votes does not prevent the governor, under R. I. Const. art. 7, § 6, from adjourning the general assembly in case of disagreement between the two houses. Id.

3. LIENS. See also FACTORS, 1.

A statute giving livery-stable keepers a lien for the keeping of animals placed in their charge, without the knowledge or consent of the mortgagee, does not make such lien superior to that of a prior duly recorded mortgage on the animals, even though the law day has passed and the animals are still in the mortgagor's possession. *Chapman v. 2. Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel an electric-railroad company to place guard wires where they will prevent dangerous contact of its uninsulated wires with the insulated wires of a telephone company, as required by ordinance. State, Wisconsin Teleph. Co. v. Janesville Street R. Co. (Wis.) 759

3. Mandamus is peculiarly the proper remedy to compel a town council to call a new election, as required by statute, where a prior election is inoperative. State v. South Kingstown (R. I.) 65

4. Mandamus to compel officers to proceed under prior laws in respect to elections, instead of following an unconstitutional statute, is not premature because no demand and refusal has been made or the time arrived when it is the duty of the officers to act. State, Morris, v. Wrightson (N. J. Sup.) 548

1. One who volunteers to assist the servants of another assumes all the ordinary risks incident to the situation, and cannot recover from the master for injuries caused by defects in the instrumentality used or by the mere negligence of the servants. Boarts v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. (Minn.) 663

2. A mere volunteer, although he has placed himself in a position of danger through his own negligence, can recover of the master for injuries received by reason of the failure of servants to exercise reasonable care to prevent injury to him after discovering the danger. Id.

3. An injury to a brakeman caused by the improper loading of a flat car so that the end of the load projected does not render the railroad company liable to him, where the car itself was not defective, and the company had furnished a competent inspector to see that the cars were properly loaded. Dewey v. Detroit, G. & H. M. R. Co. (Mich.) 292

4. A railroad track owned, maintained, and repaired by a manufacturing company and used by a railroad company only under a license or invitation to deliver freight under a contract, is not a part of the railroad company's "ways," within the meaning of Mass. Stat. 1887, chap. 270, § 2, creating a liability for the death of an employé by reason of any defect in such ways. Engel v. New York, P. & B. R. Co. (Mass.) 283

5. An employé engaged in repairing an engine belonging to his employer, and the engineer, whose duty it is to prevent the starting of the engine while the repairer is at work, are fellow servants. Dantelier v. De Bardeleben Coal & I. Co. (Ala.) 861

6. Negligence in the exercise of superintendence entrusted to an employé, within the meaning of Ala. Code, § 2590, subs. 2, does not exist in the case of an engineer whose duty it is personally to operate the engine, although he usually has a helper, where, in the absence of the helper, by the negligence of the engineer in starting the engine, or in failing to prevent a third person from starting it, a person engaged in repairing the engine is killed, since the primary duty of the engineer is not that of superintendence, but that of a laborer. Dantzler v. De Bardeleben Coal & I. Co. (Ala.) 361

7. A railroad company is not liable for the death of an engineer, which was due to a collision occasioned by his violation of the rules in running his train at excessive speed. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Kane (Ga.) 815

8. A railroad company's failure to recover a switch key from a discharged employé is not of itself sufficient to make the company liable for his criminal act in maliciously misplacing a switch for the purpose of wrecking a train. Id.

1. Profane language is not a common nuisance, unless it is heard by citizens and the manner and occasion of the utterances are offensive and annoying. Com. v. Linn (Pa.) 353

2. The right of a city to build a pumping station for waterworks on its own land, so near the premises of a private owner that buildings subsequently erected by him will be made untenable by the noise and vibration of the pumping machinery, is not conferred, even if the legislature has power to confer it without compensation to him, by a general authority to locate necessary structures and machinery for the waterworks. Morton v. New York (N. Y.) 241

8. The legislative authority which will shelter an actual nuisance must be express, or a clear and unquestionable implication from powers conferred, certain and unambiguous, and such as to show that the legislature must have intended and contemplated the doing of the very act in question. Id.

2. Election commissioners to prepare for, hold, and declare the result of a municipal election, are not officers in any sense; and their appointment or designation by the legislature is not necessarily or essentially executive in its nature. State, Lamar, v. Dillon (Fla.) 124

3. Appointive as well as elective officers are within Wyo. Const. art. 6, § 16, providing that officers shall hold until their successors are qualified. People, Richardson, v. Henderson (Wyo.) 751

4. Upon the appointment of an officer to fill a vacancy "until the next meeting of the legislature," under a statute making no further provision as to the incumbency, the meeting of the legislature does not create another vacancy in the office within the meaning of Wyo. Const. art. 4, § 7, authorizing the governor to fill a vacancy when there is no other provision made therefor, since art. 6, § 16, provides that every officer shall hold "until his successor is qualified." Id.

5. A person appointed to fill a vacancy in a board of police commissioners is appointed only till the end of the term of his predecessor under a charter providing generally for appointment to fill a vacancy, but which provides for two-year terms and for the expiration of a part of them in each year, with other provisions as to a non-partisan board. State, Rylands, v. Pinkerman (Conn.) 653

6. A person is not a de facto police commissioner when he has not the reputation of being such, or his acts and authority are not generally recognized or acquiesced in or such as to lead men to suppose that he is such officer, especially where there is a rightful commissioner who is claiming the office. Id.

7. Misconduct of a person before appointment to office constitutes no ground for his removal. Speed v. Detroit (Mich.) 842

8. Power to remove a city counselor is not implied in Mich. Act 1893, § 8, providing that 22 L. R. A.

2. The casting vote of mayor may be given on the choice of officers as well as on a measure of legislation. Id.

2. An archbishop who has title to the soil on which a Roman Catholic Church stands has no greater rights in respect to the demolition of a pew therein owned by an individual than an organized religious corporation of any other denomination would have by reason of its ownership of the church. Id.

3. A conveyance of a pew prior to Mass. Stat. 1855, chap. 122, except in Boston, was required to be by deed, as the pew was real estate. Id.

Louisville & N. R. Co.* (Ky.) 72

2. A breach of diligence shown by allegations and evidence of the defendant, although not referred to in the plaintiff's pleadings, may be urged by the plaintiff to defeat defendant's justification, but not as a basis of recovery. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Kane (Ga.) 815

3. The objection of want of parties, when taken by plea or answer, should give the names of the necessary parties when this can be done, and especially where it is peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendants. Cass v. Minot (Mass.) 536

4. Failure to plead the invalidity of a contract on the ground of public policy will not prevent the courts from refusing to enforce it. Sheldon v. Pruessner (Kan.) 709

in the provisions of a statute forbidding the crossing of a yard by the tracks of other companies. Seattle & M. R. Co. v. State (Wash.) 217

2. An implied invitation or license to the public to cross a railroad track at a certain place can arise only from such appearances or circumstances as would lead ordinarily prudent and intelligent persons to understand that the crossing was public. Chenery v. Fitchburg R. Co. (Mass.) 575

3. An invitation to the public to cross a railroad at a certain place, at which the company must therefore use reasonable care to protect the crossers, is not shown as a matter of law by the fact that people are accustomed to cross there without objection, although the fact of continuous crossing might be evidence to the jury of a license. Id.

4. A person who crawls under cars across a highway five times within an hour and a half, and is caught the sixth time and his leg crushed, is precluded by his own contributory negligence from recovering damages, even though the servants of the railroad company failed to ring the bell or sound the whistle before starting. Bumpel v. Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. (Id.) 725

5. A traveler is not guilty of contributory negligence—as matter of law at least—in failing to anticipate and guard against the running of a train in a dark night without any headlight, so as to defeat a recovery for injuries in being struck by an engine running backward at a railroad crossing, although there was a failure to stop and listen before endeavoring to cross the track. Van Auken v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. (Mich.) 83

6. The crossing of a highway and railroad at different elevations, one passing under the other, is not within the provisions of the statute as to the rate of speed of trains or as to ringing the bell or blowing the whistle at a highway crossing. Jenson v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. (Wis.) 680

7. Failure to ring the bell or sound the whistle of a train on approaching a highway which passes under the railroad cannot be regarded as negligence which will make the railroad company liable for frightening a horse by the passing of the train, if the noise of the bell or whistle would under the circumstances have merely increased the noise of the train and tended to frighten the horse still more. Id.

1. Recording an instrument purporting to convey standing timber, in a book called "Mis-

2. The omission to mention the state where the lands are situated, in an instrument purporting to sell standing timber, will not destroy the effect of the record as notice, although the instrument is executed in another state, if it is properly acknowledged and recorded in the county where the lands are situated, and the record title there stands in the name of the grantor. Id.

4. The rule in Shelley's Case cannot operate so as to vest an indefeasible fee in a person to whom a life estate is given with an estate in fee to his heirs provided he outlives a prior life tenant. Id.

5. The rule in Shelley's Case has not been abolished in North Carolina by the statutory provision that any limitation to the heirs of a living person shall be construed to be the children of such person unless a contrary intention appears. Id.

3. A provision of a church constitution that no rule shall be passed "to change or do away with the confession of faith as it now stands" does not prevent changes in the interest of clearness of expression or fullness of statement of the accepted doctrines of the church. Id.

An affirmative vote of more than two thirds of those voting in response to a proposition of the governing body of a church to change the constitution is effective under a constitution authorizing changes "on the request of two thirds of the whole society," although the whole number of votes cast is only a little over one third of the church membership. Id.

1. The delivery of goods to a common carrier to be forwarded to a purchaser who has instructed them to be thus delivered is a delivery to him, and passes the title to him subject to the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu. Ramsey & G. Mfg. Co. v. Kelsea (N. J. Err. & App.) 415

2. No implied warranty of competency or fitness for breeding purposes is made by stock breeders on the sale of a bull, although a full price is paid and the sellers know that he is bought for breeding purposes, where there is no fraud or misrepresentation, and both parties are alike destitute of knowledge or the means of forming an intelligent judgment as to the fitness or capacity of the animal for that purpose. *McQuaid v. STATUTES. See also APPEAL AND ERROR, 4; CORPORATIONS, 8.

1. The purpose of Fla. Const. art. 3, § 18, that a statute shall not take effect until sixty days from the final adjournment of the legislature at which it may be enacted, unless otherwise specially provided in the Act, was to enable the people to become acquainted with the provisions of the legislation, and not to require them to govern their actions by the same before it has become operative. Sammis v. Bennett (Fla.) 48

2. The requirement of a new election within ten days, in R. I. Pub. Stat. chap. 710, § 18, in case of the failure of an election, does not limit the power, but is intended to insure its timely exercise, and must be regarded, not as mandatory, but merely directory, where the time named has elapsed without an election. State v. South Kingstown (R. I.) 65

3. An express repeal of all Acts inconsistent therewith, contained in a statute amending a general law so as to create an exception for a particular town, does not repeal a prior special statute which in effect excepted another town from such general law. Id.

4. If the good and the bad features of a statute are not so essentially and inseparably connected in substance or so interdependent as that it cannot be said that the legislature would not have passed the one without enacting the other, it is the duty of the court to give effect to so much as is good. State, Lamar, v. Dillon (Fla.) 124

5. The rejection of an invalid feature of a municipal Act restricting a voter to some one of the candidates whose names are printed on the official ballot does not affect the valid portions of the Act. Id.

6. The fact that a territorial legislature had no power over tidelands does not change the effect of a territorial statute as to railroads along "any river, stream of water, watercourse, etc.," after the admission of the territory as a state. Seattle & M. R. Co. v. State (Wash.) 217

2. A constitutional guaranty of religious liberty is not violated by a statute prohibiting Sunday labor. Id.

3. Riding home from a railroad station in a peaceable and quiet manner on Sabbath evening is not such a violation of statute against labor, sport, games, etc., on that day as will defeat a right to recover for injuries received from a train at a railway crossing. *Van Auken v. TAXES. See also CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 6; VOTERS AND ELECTIONS, 6.

1. A constitutional provision requiring uniformity and equality of taxation is violated by a statute authorizing a state revenue agent to levy and collect back taxes when, in his opinion, the assessed value on which taxes have been collected was too little. Adams v. Tonella (Miss.) 846

2. If an occupation tax can be upheld in any case as an exercise of the taxing power, it must not violate a constitutional requirement of uniformity; and therefore a tax imposed by the legislature on the exercise of an occupation in some counties, but not in others, is unconstitutional. State v. Moore (N. C.) 472

3. Stock in trade of a partnership doing business in a city, which remains there until it is sold in course of business, is "permanently located" there for purposes of taxation, without regard to the residence of members of the firm, within the meaning of the exception in Md. Const. art. 8, § 51, making goods taxable at the residence of the owner, except when "permanently located" elsewhere. Hopkins v. Baker (Md.) 477

4. A stock in trade of a trading partnership is properly assessed to the firm, instead of to the individual members, where the law provides for the assessment of goods at a place 22 L. R. A.

where they are permanently located, without regard to the residence of the owners. Id.

5. A statute giving a state officer unlimited power and discretion to fix the valuation of property which he thinks has been assessed for too little, without any opportunity to the taxpayer to be heard except in defense of a suit to collect the taxes, is in violation of a state constitution which provides that property shall be assessed under general laws, by uniform rules, according to its true value, and which also provides for assessors as county officers. Adams v. Tonella (Miss.) 846

6. Property owned by a charitable institution is not exempt from taxation if not used by the institution, under Mont. Const. art. 12, § 2, exempting property "used exclusively for" certain specified purposes, including "institutions of public charity." Montana Catholic Missions v. Lewis & O. County (Mont.) 684

7. The intention to use property, by a charitable institution, is not equivalent to the use of it, within a provision as to exemption from taxation. Id.

8. The exercise of the power to mine its own coal by a manufacturing corporation, to supply itself in part with the raw material used by it, does not defeat the exemption of its capital stock from taxation, under Pa. Act 1889, but requires such exemption to be limited to that part of the capital which is used exclusively in manufacturing. Com. v. Juniata Coke Co. (Pa.) 233

9. The immunity from taxation of the capital stock of a corporation "exclusively engaged in manufacturing," under Pa. Act 1889, is not lost by its possession of the ancillary power of mining to supply its own raw material,—especially where it has never used, or sought to use, this power. *Com. v. 1. The words "sarsaparilla and iron" cannot be claimed as a trademark for a medicinal compound or beverage including sarsaparilla and iron as ingredients, as against an alleged infringing compound of which the words are equally descriptive, even if the ingredients named are only a small part of the compound. Schmidt v. Brieg (Cal.) 790

2. A palpable imitation of a label for a medicinal compound called "Sarsaparilla and Iron," both having the word "sarsaparilla" at the top in large letters, and the word "iron" in the border of the lower half of the label, and both having parallel lines across the middle, with the names of the manufacturers between, and their monogram in the same position, and both having the words "a great blood purifier" and "cures all skin diseases," printed in the lower half of the label, while the only material difference in the design and appearance of the labels is in their color,—is sufficient to constitute an infringement, even if there is no valid trademark in any of the words copied. Id.

3. The use of labels, marks, and devices so closely resembling those used by one claiming a trademark as to deceive purchasers exercising ordinary care, constitutes an infringement of his rights, independently of the validity of the trademark in question. Id.

TRIAL.

1. The constitutional right of trial by jury is not violated by a statute which provides for the determination by the court of the degree of crime, on a plea of guilty of murder. State v. Almy (N. H.) 744

2. Refusing questions leading in form after similar ones have been answered is proper. Manufacturers' Acci. Indemnity Co. v. Dorman (C. C. App. 6th C.) 620

3. The due care of a railroad company in protecting its switches from interference by malicious acts of third persons is a question for the jury. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Kane (Ga.) 815

4. The sufficiency of the notice of death is a question of law, where it depends on the construction of an accident policy to determine whether the time of the notice runs from the date of death, or of the discovery of the fact of death. Trippe v. Provident Fund Soc. (N. Y.) 433

5. Charging that electricity requires the "utmost caution to control" is not erroneous in an action by one who, while passing along a sidewalk, was injured by contact with a telephone wire which was hanging near the walk and was heavily charged by an electric-light wire,—especially where, immediately afterwards, the jury are told to measure defendant's conduct by that of a "cautious and prudent man." Ahern v. Oregon Teleph. & Telog. Co. (Or.) 635

6. It is not error for the judge to express an opinion on the question whether a railway company had been guilty of negligence in respect to loaded cars left on a switch, which was left open so as to derail them if they got loose, where the circumstances call for words of caution from him, because of a collision due to the criminal act of a stranger, and the jury are told that it is for them to decide the whole matter. Fredericks v. Northern O. R. Co. (Pa.) 806

7. In case of substantial dispute as to the facts concerning negligence, a verdict cannot be directed. Newark Passenger R. Co. v. Bloch (N. J. Err. & App.) 874

8. It is not error to direct the jury as to an answer to a special interrogatory, where the evidence is all one way, and a party cannot complain of such direction because he wants to know whether the jury are making their findings of the facts in accordance with the evidence. Van Auken v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. (Mich.) 83

VOTERS AND ELECTIONS. See also MANDAMUS, 8-5; OFFICERS, 2; STATUTES, 2.

1. A statute providing for a new election within ten days in case of the failure of an election in a town divided into voting districts does not violate the Rhode Island Constitution providing for a reopening of the polls in case there is no election, as this applies only to towns which are not divided into districts. State v. South Kingstown (R. I.) 65

2. The right to vote is not an inherent or absolute right generally reserved in bills of rights, but its possession is dependent upon constitutional or statutory grant. State, Lamar, v. Dillon (Fla.) 124

3. Although the legislature cannot change or add to constitutional qualifications of electors in any way, where the Constitution does not confer the right to vote or prescribe the qualifications of voters, it is competent for the legislature, as the representative of the law-making power of the State, to do so. Id.

4. Elections for municipal officers are not within Fla. Const. art. 6, § 1, prescribing the qualifications of electors at all elections under it, but are subject to statutory regulation, and it is competent for the legislature to prescribe the qualifications of voters at the same. Id.

5. The legislature having the power under the Florida Constitution to make the payment of a capitation tax not exceeding $1 a year a prerequisite for voting, the payment of delinquent capitation taxes may be required provided they do not amount to more than $1 for each year. Id.

6. A statute giving a voter an "opportunity to qualify by registering and himself paying his own poll taxes for such years" does not deprive him of his right to pay his said poll taxes through an authorized agent. Id.

7. General provisions of the criminal law disqualifying persons convicted of certain crimes from voting at any election can and must be construed in harmony with Fla. Laws 1898, chap. 4801, making residents who were qualified to vote at the preceding general election the electors at a city election. Id.

8. The provisions of Fla. Const. art. 6, § 6, that in all elections by the people the vote shall be by ballot, applies to municipal elections. Id.

9. It is competent for the legislature to prescribe an official ballot and prohibit the use of any other; and it may also provide for printing the names of candidates regularly nominated by a convention or mass meeting, or who run as independents; but it cannot restrict the elector to voting for some one of the candidates whose names are printed upon the official ballot. The Constitution guarantees to him the right to vote for whom he pleases. Id.

10. The provisions of the Indiana statutes, that a ballot bearing a distinguishing mark or mutilation shall be void, and also that a stamp elsewhere than on a square prescribed by statute shall be treated as a distinguishing mark, 22 L. R. A.

are mandatory, and not merely directory, so that a corrupt intent in making such prohibited mark is not necessary to defeat the vote. Sego v. Stoddard (Ind.) 468

11. A stamp at or on a square opposite a blank space left for the name of a candidate is a distinguishing mark under the Indiana statute which prohibits any stamp excepting in the square enclosing the device or in the square opposite the name of a candidate. Id.

12. A hole in a ballot made in scratching out a stamp mark constitutes a distinguishing mark or mutilation within the prohibition of the Indiana statutes, although the ballot is otherwise properly stamped. Id.

13. A lead-pencil mark across the name of a candidate is a distinguishing mark which makes the ballot invalid under the Indiana statute which prohibits any distinguishing mark or mutilation. Id.

14. An election held under a statute with an invalid provision making the action of a ministerial board conclusive on a voter's right to cast his ballot will not, on this account alone, be set aside, in the absence of any showing that voters were deprived by the action of such board of any rights conferred by the statute. *State, Lamar, v. 1. The common-law rule regarding surface water as a common enemy which a land owner may, when necessary for the protection of his property, throw back on neighboring land to the damage of the owner thereof, exists in South Carolina, under S. C. Gen. Stat. § 2784, adopting the common law of England. Edwards v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. (S. C.) 246

2. A sluiceway between the piers of a bridge, extended above and below between the filling by which flats have been reclaimed, through which the tide ebbs and flows, but which has no water in it at low tide, is not a watercourse which can be the basis of riparian rights. Chamberlain v. Hemingway (Conn.) 45

3. Permitting tidewater to flow for more than fifteen years through a sluiceway made, when flats were filled in, by leaving an opening above and below a bridge corresponding to that between its piers, does not create any adverse right in owners of adjoining uplands through which the sluiceway extends to the continuance of such flow, so as to prevent an owner from filling in the sluiceway on flats in front of his uplands. Id.

4. Accretions formed in front of the land of several owners belong to them all, and cannot be claimed by one with whose land the first point of contact was made. Orandall v. Allen (Mo.) 591

5. Accretions which begin to form upon land which was originally not riparian, but became such by the washing away of a portion of an intermediate tract, and which continue to form until they reach the latter tract and then fill out in front of it, replacing some of its washed-out portion, do not all belong to the land on which they begin to form, but that portion of them which forms beyond its original boundary line and along the washed-out portion of the adjoining land belongs to the latter. Id.

6. The policy to allow riparian owners on navigable rivers where the tide does not flow, to build wharves in aid of navigation, is shown in Oregon by the absence of legislation on that subject, in connection with legislation providing for the disposal of tidelands. Lewis v. Portland (Or.) 786

WILLS. See also EVIDENCE, 19.

1. The name of the testator written at the beginning of a will is sufficiently near his mark at the end to make the mark a valid signature, within a statute requiring the name to be written near the mark, if the intention that the mark should represent the testator's name clearly appears. Re Guilfoyle's Will (Cal.) 870

2. A testator, knowing how, but being unable because of physical weakness, to write his name, is within the meaning of a statute permitting a mark "when the person cannot write." Id.

3. A will is sufficiently signed in the presence of the testatrix, although her name had been previously written thereto by another person, where the latter, in her presence and by her request, adds to her name words showing that it was written by him at her request. Ex parte Leonard (S. C.) 802

4. Express directions by a testatrix to sign her name to the will are sufficiently given by her answering "Yes" to one who inquires if he shall sign the will for her. Id.

5. One who signs the name of a testatrix at her request may be also one of the subscribing witnesses to the will. Id.

6. Attesting witnesses to a will must be such as are competent at the date of attestation, and, if then competent, their subsequent incompetency, from whatever cause, will not prevent the probate of the will. Re Holt's Will (Minn.) 481

7. A married person is not to be deemed an incompetent attesting witness at the time of the execution of a will, simply because the husband or wife of such person is a beneficiary under the will, since the question of incompetency can arise, if at all, only on the subsequent probate of the will, upon his or her examination as a witness, and then only in the single contingency that such beneficiary becomes a contestant, and does not then consent to the examination of the witness. Id.

8. The statute making void a legacy to an attesting witness does not apply to the husband or wife of such witness. Id.

9. A gift by will of a chest and its contents does not operate as a devise of land, by reason of the fact that a deed of the land was in the chest. Parrot v. Avery (Mass.) 158

10. A devise of land to trustees, with power to collect the income for charitable purposes, giving them power to appoint their successors, and providing against failure of trustees indefinitely, passes the fee, if the devise is valid. Johnson v. Johnson (Tenn.) 179

11. A bequest of testator's set of books "and the proceeds of all collections he can make from accounts which were the results of my past oil and cotton business. . . . The accounts against or in favor of [certain of testator's relatives] as well as accounts of properties. Rents, stocks, bonds, and investments, to be treated as memorandums only, and not to be included in the above bequest,"—does not pass the accounts against the relatives. Id.

12. A legacy from a surety to his cosurety jointly and severally liable with him for the principal's default is subject to deduction for the proportionate share of the legatee of the amount the estate of the testator is compelled to pay upon such liability, although the legacy is assigned to a third person before any payment is made by the surety. Re Bailey's Estate (Pa.) 444
